WHAT WE THINK

Chickens coming home to roost

Make no mistake. The bomb explosions in Istanbul, one of the victims of which was our Consul Roger Short, were targeted at Britain, and are the penalty we have been made to pay for Premier Blair's collaboration with the Americans in their invasion and occupation of Iraq. It had long been predicted that something like this was going to happen, and now the predictions have come true.

But it was equally predictable that the response of Blair and his Government would be, not to reconsider their insane policy of supporting Bush's war, but only to treat the bombings as an affirmation of how right the policy has been. The attacks in Istanbul, claimed Blair at a press conference on the 21st November, showed that the mission in Iraq was "noble and necessary."

In fact, this amounts to a classic non-sequitur. The Government has claimed – and it has been acknowledged by the perpetrators

Nationalist comment

– that the attacks were the work of Al Qaeda. It has been clearly established that there was never any link between Al Qaeda and the former Iraqi régime of Saddam Hussein. Equally clear is that the quick military victory of the Coalition in Iraq has done nothing whatever to put an end to terror but has merely increased it.

Blair said at the same press conference:-

"Once again we must affirm that in the face of this terrorism there must be no holding back, no compromise, no hesitation in confronting this menace, in attacking it wherever and whenever we can and in defeating it utterly."

Tough words! But let us remember that these words come from the man who has been compromising and holding back from dealing with the terror of the IRA from the moment he took office six and a half years ago. Why this appearance of steely resolve against terror abroad while there is the same jellyfish policy towards terror at home?

But such tough words are mere empty blather. The fact is that Al Qaeda and other Islamic terrorists have an enormous sea in which to swim – in the form of the vast extent and teeming populations of the Islamic world. There simply is no way to stop them by armed offensives into Islamic countries. The only solution to the terror is to understand the grievances that give rise to them and then remove those grievances. From the standpoint of America, this means withdrawing support from Israel. From the standpoint of Britain, it means ceasing to be America's lapdog.

The Istanbul atrocities showed Tony

Blair's chickens coming home to roost. But will the lessons be learned? At the moment it seems highly unlikely. How many more British soldiers and civilians will have to die before sanity prevails?

Anti-Bush protest: were the media hiding the facts?

The large demonstrations against President Bush's visit to Britain last month seem to us to have been aimed at the wrong target. The object of the protests should have been, not the US leader, but his British lackey. It was Tony Blair, not George W. Bush, who sent British forces into Iraq and who is now keeping them there. The protesters seem to need reminding that Britain is supposed to be a sovereign state, and one which should be making its own decisions as to whether to go to war and whether to maintain a post-war occupation of a foreign country. Bush is not to blame for British deaths suffered in the Iraq conflict, Blair is.

This said, a considerable number of quite normal, decent British people turned out for the demonstrations – many of them perhaps understanding that Blair should be the focus of their anger but taking part because those demonstrations were the only show in town. We know these people to have been there because we had observers on the spot in Central London to observe their presence. However, from TV and newspaper reports of the occasion they might just as well have been invisible.

Every TV report we saw and every press photo that came to our notice made it appear that the only people present in the protests were a rag-bag of lefty freaks, attired in every imaginable form of weird clothing and prancing around like dervishes high on drugs. Just one look at them might have been enough to make any unthinking person feel almost sympathetic to Blair and his guest. Was this the intention of the media coverage – to discredit the anti-Iraq war cause by portraying its protagonists as nothing better than a branch of Rentamob?

It happens that we and the Left have in common the fact that we both oppose Blair and Bush's Iraq policy, but we do so for vastly different reasons. We believe that Britain should never embark on overseas adventures nor risk the lives of British service personnel, except where concrete British interests are at stake. To us, what happens in a country like Iraq – who rules there and in what manner, whether there is dictatorship or 'democracy', what conditions are generally – is all a matter of supreme indifference. We cannot police the world. Even the Americans cannot police the world. They should protect what is theirs and we should protect what is ours. Nothing else is worth a single drop of our people's blood.

We believe that these same thoughts were in the minds of many who turned out on the demos on November 20th, but their presence failed to steal the show.

The Tories: just more of the same

The ditching of Iain Duncan Smith and the accession of Michael Howard to the Conservative Party leadership will change nothing. We knew this when it became clear that it was imminent, and nothing the new leader has said since he took over causes us to change our minds.

Among Howard's first words on becoming Tory boss was his statement that he would "lead from the centre." This surely must have provoked deep groans from those who hoped for something different. It was precisely because of Duncan Smith's attempts to do just that – to be at one and the same time acceptable to the party's traditionalist wing and to its flabby liberal element – that he fell between the two stools and ended up satisfying nobody, having offered no robust policies whatever to deal with the crucial problems affecting the country.

Howard couldn't have made it more clear that he was set along the same ineffectual road. "I've changed, and so must our party," he cooed in a TV interview. He pleaded for "a more consensual and inclusive approach," and spoke of "winning hearts and minds." All standard Duncan Smith language, and all futile hot air. Indeed, the very utterance of the word 'inclusive' should be enough to tell us that nothing is going to be any different. 'Inclusive' has today become one of those words that get people with healthy political instincts itching to get their hands on guns.

A few days afterwards, it was reported that the Conservatives were going to move out of their long-established headquarters in Smith Square, Westminster, in what was called "a symbolic break with the past." A party spokesman was quoted as saying that the building, with its Georgian facade, was "not a suitable office environment for a party in the 21st century." So just what is going to be achieved in terms of really relevant policies by a mere change of premises? Is the Howard regime going to be one interested primarily in cosmetics?

Another observation that might be made of the 'new' Tory Party hierarchy is that its flavour is, shall we say, more than a little 'kosher'. Howard himself is the first Jewish Tory leader since Disraeli. His shadow chancellor is none other than Michael Letwin, another political contortionist who, like Portillo, 'reinvented' himself from a hard-line 'right-winger' into a dripping wet when career requirements pointed in that direction. Then there is the new party chairman, who will be none other than Lord Saatchi. Quite a trio! Perhaps readers will advise us if we have left anyone out.

The new chief is the son of a gentleman who landed here from Romania claiming to be a 'refugee' and bearing the name of Bernat Hecht, settled himself in South Wales and took on the name of 'Howard'. That is a little surprising; knowing these people, one might have expected him to call himself something like 'Daffyd Llewellyn Jones'. However, we can quite sure of one thing: media references to son Michael will no doubt class him henceforth as a 'Welshman' – in deference to the canons of political correctness and good taste.

This, then, is Her Majesty's 'Opposition'. What do the French say about "Plus ça change..."?

What kind of police do we want?

Following the revelations of a 'spy' planted among police cadets in the Greater Manchester area – the subject of comment in these columns last month – the hue and cry about 'racism' in the ranks of our guardians of the law has reached an ever-louder crescendo of hysteria. One chief constable and deputy after another has paid the required ritual compliments to the race relations industry by speaking of his 'disgust' and 'horror' at the phenomenon. At the same time, Home Secretary David Blunkett got in his two-pennyworth by announcing that police officers with links to the British National Party would be hounded out of their jobs – something currently not possible because such people are protected by the law against any such victimisation, but something he clearly intends to change by new legislation. He said last month: "I do which they would have arrested and charged non-Whites. But this is not what Mr. Blunkett is driving at. He is maintaining that a member of the BNP should not be allowed to be a police officer, quite regardless of whether he has allowed this to affect his performance of his job or not. This brings us no small number of degrees closer to Orwell's 1984 – or, if you prefer, the Soviet police under Stalin. It is a quite intolerable interference with the rights people are supposed to enjoy in a democracy, and would justify challenge under current 'human-rights' legislation – though whether that would ever be allowed is another question.

But, even more seriously, we have to ask ourselves: what is it exactly that we want from our police? Is it the purpose of a police force to attain the greatest possible effectiveness in fighting crime? Or is policing to be based on another, essentially political, priority? Already, in the vastly lowered efficiency and morale of our police forces we can perhaps see the results of a policy by which promotions to the highest rank appear to be made on political credentials rather than ability and performance. Now it looks as if we are going to take some further steps along that path.

Men and women who choose jobs in the field of law and order tend by nature more often than not to be of a 'rightist' disposition. It would follow that a portion of them would be sympathetic to, if not actually members of, the BNP. The result of a policy that disqualifies them from jobs in the police would quite surely be to deny our police forces the services of many of their best potential officers and attract a large number of recruits of inferior quality. Is this what the country wants? It most certainly seems to be what our politicians want!

Bravo England!

It is very rarely in these times that we have the opportunity to comment on good news. However, just such an occasion was provided by the victory of England's magnificent rugby team in the World Cup in Australia last month.

To read a political message into this achievement may perhaps seem to be stretching things a bit far, but there is something about the entire England rugby set-up which provides a model for Britain in every sphere of affairs. There is the intense patriotism and desire to be best. There is a tremendous spirit of putting the team before self. There is self-confidence, pride and character. Apart from one player with a West Indian father, the winning team is overwhelmingly white and Anglo-Saxon. The players, unlike some of their soccer counterparts, look and behave like real men. English rugby has pointed the way to the kind of country we ought to be.

not believe that it is tenable for a member of the British National Party to be a police officer."

To which we must reply: why ever not? It would be perfectly right for police officers to be disciplined if there were any evidence that in the carrying out of their duties they had treated ethnic minorities in a manner different to Whites, for instance if they had allowed Whites to get away with offences for

AT LAST LABOUR ADMIT IT – THEY WANT THE IMMIGRANTS HERE!

In an historic keynote speech last month, Home Secretary David Blunkett acknowledged what we have all known but politicians, including those of his own party, have persistently denied. This Labour Government has no policy for controlling immigration; on the contrary, it is bent on promoting it.

Addressing the Royal Institute of International Affairs on the 12th November, Mr. Blunkett said that "effectively managed" legal immigration was vital for the economy and society as a whole. No successful country, he maintained, could afford to adopt an anti-immigration policy in these times.

The main thrust of the Home Secretary's speech seemed to be that the problem of dealing with immigrants coming in by the back door had become so acute, and the process so out of control, that the whole matter would be solved by making immigration legal, open and welcome. That would, of course, be denied by the Government but it is what its policy amounts to.

'LOW BIRTHRATE' ARGUMENT

The argument about immigrants being vital to the economy rests on the claim that in Britain, as with most of the rest of Europe, the birthrate of the indigenous population is so low that more young people (which most immigrants are) are urgently needed to redress the imbalance between young and old, working and non-working.

What the argument ignores is the fact that this low birthrate, and the generation imbalance in which it results, is the direct result of policies that the politicians – those of Labour in particular – have been pursuing for the past half-century. Successive governments have done everything they could to discourage Britons from having large families. This has been done by inadequate encouragement to family life, excessive taxation of the hard-working, and the constant promotion of a culture glorifying feminism and downgrading the status of women as wives and mothers.

The real solution to this problem of the British birthrate is to change these policies, change the culture and give proper encouragement to our own people to bear and raise healthy British sons and daughters.

MORE IMMIGRANTS, MORE VOTES!

But let us not imagine that the birthrate argument is the real reason why Labour wants more immigrants. That is just a facade.

Labour knows that immigrants and their descendants are more likely to vote for the party than for its rivals. The immigrants know that Labour will give them more than will the other parties. It's a cosy little two-way deal!

Not only that, but Labour is ideologically committed to a multi-racial, one-world society in which distinct nations and races will cease to exist. Labour, in effect, hates Britain and wants to destroy it. More surely than any conquering army, immigration will do this.

BLUNKETT GOES ELECTIONEERING
This Government clearly wants more immigration. It means more votes for Labour!

The things they're saying

The Government talks tough. It insists it is "not afraid to take difficult decisions."

But make no mistake. Yesterday's announcement of an amnesty for 15,000 asylum-seeker families is a despairing admission of utter failure.

This is a Government that has lost control of our borders, lost control of the asylum system and increasingly relies on rhetoric as the shambles lurches from bad to worse...

... the message to would-be refugees might as well be proclaimed with bells and whistles: make it to Britain and you're home free. Not only will you be looked after and legally aided, but you can appeal to your heart's content. And in the end you'll be allowed to stay, whether your claim is bogus or not.

LEADER ARTICLE
Daily Mail (25.10.03)

It is way past the time this Government and all its associated parts took note of the growing resentment and anxieties of the indigenous population.

We are fed up with the asylum shambles, seeing those here walking about, well-dressed, new small mobile 'phones.

My sons work every hour of the day and sometimes longer to keep their heads above water to pay their way. They are decent, law-abiding citizens as are millions more, whilst all these young immigrants – all young men – seem to sit around in coffee bars with money to spend! They are not British citizens and should not have the rights of such.

Lastly, why can't all these young men be sent back and trained to fight the enemy in their country as our young men had to 63 years ago!

And now, yet again, our young men are fighting and dying in the countries of these immigrants, illegal or otherwise, while they swan around here.

We are constantly warned against applying any generalisations to the Islamic or black communities. We must not think that Muslim clerics, pouring out their murderous hatred of the West and Judaism, have anything to do with the overwhelming majority of moderate Muslims. Similarly, we must not be trapped into the dangerous fallacy that gun violence, drug-dealing and serial fatherhood are somehow prevalent among young Afro-Caribbean men.

Yet this terror of stereotyping of anyone – except white police officers – ignores the reality of modern British society. Islamic fundamentalism and black criminality are not figments of a twisted imagination. They are an integral part of the cultural diversity we are all meant to celebrate... After decades of advancing multi-culturalism, Britain is the most violent country in Europe, with the highest rates of gun crime, drug-taking and street robbery.

In such a context, it is hardly a surprise if some white police officers, working in crime-ridden urban areas, have a suspicious view of certain ethnic minorities. That is not prejudice. It is just experience.

What kind of police force will emerge from the permanent frenzy of 'anti-racism'? It will certainly be an effective instrument of the coming Total State. And if informers are to be an acknowledged presence in the police force, why shouldn't the authorities implant them in every profession and activity?

Look closely at your neighbour at all times. He may be watching you.

The reduction of the police force to a crowd of uneasy, mutually suspicious neurotics will be the latest triumph of the race relations industry. It will not be the last.

Two men bobbing up and down, sniping at each other, scoring points but changing nothing. This is how Prime Minister's Question Time appears.

Yet just about everyone agreed last week that Michael Howard gave as good as he got, boosted Tory morale and brought the House back to life...

I really don't think any of these chaps has any idea how pointless this looks beyond the rarified atmosphere of Westminster. Two smug barristers trying to outdo each other is not my idea of fun, or democracy.

All parties talk of trying to find a new way of doing politics. This is not it. Yet while the political classes continue to celebrate these peculiar performances, nothing will change.

It is always gratifying when a politician gets a taste of the disastrous consequences of his actions.

Hence my pleasure on reading that Paul Wolfowitz, America's Deputy Defence Secretary and number two to the famous prose poet, Donald Rumsfeld, had narrowly escaped death on his recent visit to Iraq when a rocket was fired at his hotel. Colleagues were described as having to flee from their rooms clutching their pyjamas.

No one did more to promote the ill-fated Iraq invasion than this neo-conservative hawk

Mr. Wolfowitz. It was he who was reported long ago, when the invasion was first being discussed, as saying that Iraq was 'do-able'.

Since then, thousands have died and American soldiers are being killed on a daily basis. Now the thing that must worry Wolfowitz and, I presume, Blair and Straw, is whether Iraq is undo-able. In other words, how and when are they going to get out of the mess they have got themselves into.

A squalid putsch and a series of dirty deals will not save the Tory Party. Nothing will save the Tory Party.

The efforts to do so are macabre and ugly, like the goings-on in Dr. Frankenstein's laboratory.

The pathetic relief and forced smiles of Tory MPs after the latest leadership transplant have the look of desperation, as well they might.

I marvel at the blatant dishonesty of the whole thing. Is anyone really fooled?

Only a week ago, the people now rallying to Michael Howard with cries of devotion were declaring their deathless loyalty to IDS, now carted off in a political body bag. Power-hungry figures have refrained from standing for the leadership and we are supposed to believe they were offered nothing in return.

Bah, humbug!

The Tory Party currently resembles a cage in which several savage small animals are kept in order only by the threat that the pet-shop owner will drown the lot of them if they succumb to the biting and gouging that they instinctively long to do.

'Nice' or 'Nasty'? Tory politicians themselves have chosen to describe alternative policies in these childish but convenient terms, so we may as well use them...

'Nice' (or modernising) policies would mean lots of women and 'ethnic minority' candidates, with a good number of homosexuals, blind, deaf and crippled people, at least one dwarf and perhaps the odd giant. The leader would have to be black...

'Nasty' (that is recognisably Conservative) policies would mean, for a start, quietly taking over the British National Party, and adapting some of its more reasonable ideas, quitting 'Europe', abolishing the Commission for Racial Equality and restoring the death penalty...

More on the enemy within

"By the early 1990s MI5 had successfully recruited or turned several agents inside the BNP."

Defending the Realm (Mark Hollingsworth and Nick Fielding) 1999.

"Scotland yard and MI5 are planning a huge covert operation to break up violent racist organisations. The Express has learned that intelligence officers will infiltrate Far Right groups such as the British National Party... 'We plan to close down these organisations by using every administrative device available to us,' said a Yard source."

Daily Express, 8th February 1999.

WHEN, some four years ago, I said that the nationalist movement in Britain was heavily infiltrated by government agents, and that these had had a significant role in certain important developments in the movement there was much shaking of heads. Even some of my closest allies and friends – people in broad agreement with me on movement matters – thought that perhaps in this case I was taking conspiracy theories a bit too far.

It is interesting to observe that the matters on which I spoke then are now common currency in nationalist circles, with some connoisseurs even exceeding my own zeal in reading state infiltration and sabotage into recent events.

Of course, there is always a danger of taking this conspiracy theme too far. No one should ever underestimate the human factor in politics: the ways in which personal egoism, ambition, jealousy, vindictiveness, naïvety and folly can suffice to explain unfavourable happenings which it is tempting to put down to some diabolically subversive plan. In all such matters there has to be some balance, and we have to evaluate these happenings with objectivity and cool heads, marshalling and considering all the known facts and not allowing pet personal hobby-horses to cloud judgement. As a fully paid-up member of the association of conspiracy theorists, I have often to impose this discipline on myself – lest conspiracy should become a convenient excuse for our own shortcomings and failures. Nevertheless, in the case of a movement like our own is always wise to recognise the existence of destructively subversive forces close at hand. As another writer in this magazine said only last month when speaking in an entirely different context, just because you're paranoid it doesn't mean they're not out to get you!

I first started to think seriously about the question of enemy sabotage of nationalist organisations back in the late 1970s when leader of the National Front. It occurred to me then, drawing upon some 20 years of previous experience, that these organisations seemed to have built into them an almost uncanny self-destruct facility. Just when progress was being consolidated and favourable opportunities for the future were in prospect, they would implode in orgies of internal conflict, and often disintegrate into fragments – when a bit of calm and mature discussion of differences could have kept things together. Indeed, it was not infrequently that such conflict could break out at moments of the greatest political success, whereas the standard supposition has always been that they occur in times of disappointment and frustration, with a natural search for scapegoats.

Who is the enemy?

A definition of what is meant by 'enemy' should at this point be made clear. It can be the government of the day, operating through its agencies of internal security and policing, which in Britain are normally MI5 and the institutions of the mass media. It could even be some foreign agency. Israel's Mossad would very likely be one, but there is also the CIA, which I am convinced has people active all around the globe in operations to damage parties outside (and indeed inside) the United States which stand for national sovereignty and thus threaten the drive to a Washington-dominated World Order.

That these various agencies may have different reasons for working against groups like the BNP should not obscure the fact that, pursuant to the same end, they will co-operate. We already have evidence that Searchlight magazine works hand-in-glove with the broadcasting services and certain mainstream national newspapers in partnerships where the different parties, though they may not like each other, are perfectly willing to hold their noses in operations geared to damaging our party. Therefore when we use the term 'enemy' in a sweeping and rather inexact way this is perfectly permissible in as far as we are speaking of alliances of hostile

HEADQUARTERS OF THE THOUGHT POLICE

This horrific-looking building on London's South Bank is the nerve centre of operations aimed at neutralising dissident political groups like the BNP

Special Branch of Scotland Yard. It could be the political left, of which the Searchlight organisation comes first to mind. It could be one of the mainstream political parties, especially the Conservative Party, which has an interest in keeping nationalists corralled impotently within its own fold rather than have them working, much more effectively, against the party from the outside. It could be one or more of the vast and powerful persons and organisations working to a common goal.

So what is that common goal? It is self-evident that it is to damage, neutralise and if possible destroy the kind of organisation that the BNP represents. "We plan to close down these organisations..." A Scotland Yard representative has been honest enough to spell it out. Does anyone seriously suggest that since those words were uttered a little under five years ago the spokesman and his colleagues have been sitting on their hands?

'Close down' actually may be an oversimplification. Where in any country there is a strong current of opposition to prevailing policy, the closure of one such organisation is likely only to lead to the opening up of another. Until such time as Britain has its own network of gulags, to which places are dispatched the leaders of radical dissent, there is always going to exist a body of opinion, not insubstantial, whose adherents are ready to work actively against the policy of the day, the ruling consensus. The emergence of such a movement cannot be prevented, and as the consequences of the policy bite harder it is likely to grow and become 'dangerous'. Short of actual physical suppression, how is to be countered? The answer to this question has been worked out a long time ago.

Sabotaging revolution

In an article on this subject in the May 2001 issue of Spearhead, I referred to the practice of the Czarist police in pre-revolutionary Russia of planting their agents in radical, left-wing and 'liberal' organisations, sometimes to keep an eye open for illegal activity – assassination plots, for instance – but also to act as agents of disruption, division, internal quarrelling and destabilisation. The idea was to prevent any revolutionary organisation achieving sufficient of a coalescing of individuals and factions to become powerful and truly threaten the status quo. If a revolutionary party existed that might show signs of this, it must be split and its parts rendered too small and under-resourced to be effective. And there were ample individuals on hand to assist in that process, some simply following the disruptive impulses of their own natures, some acting according to a deliberate strategy traceable to the commissariat of police responsible to the Czar himself.

On the other hand, if no such revolutionary organisations existed at all, there would be lacking the safety valves necessary for revolutionary activity to find outlets. Better that they be preserved in some form or another, as long as they were politically impotent. In other words, if a channel for opposition did not exist, it would have to be created!

This technique became widely employed throughout the world in the century following, and it came to be known as 'controlled opposition'. It is a well-understood device of all totalitarians, though there can be and have been instances where it may be employed for essentially patriotic purposes – a situation most definitely not applicable to late 20th and early 21st century Britain.

Just how are government or other hostile agents placed in organisations so that they may work to this purpose? There are two main methods.

THE BOND IMAGE

By the projection of this fantasy world of cinema and TV, people can be persuaded that by working as government agents against 'extremists' they are doing their patriotic duty.

The agent may be recruited by the state security service as a career operative. He or she will join the service perhaps on leaving university because of a liking for such work. In Defending the Realm, a book describing the work of MI5, the authors Mark Hollingsworth and Nick Fielding say of those who gravitate to this kind of profession:-

"Glamour and secrecy make for a very élite club. Some accept membership as a birthright. To those of a new broader intake, who were not born to expect easy superiority, membership is a privilege. To both types, belonging to MI5 offers a private thrill. This can compensate for many social or personal inadequacies."

Paid 'patriots'

It would be a mistake to presume that a government agent detailed to infiltrate an organisation like the BNP would necessarily be one with left-wing inclinations. According to Hollingsworth and Fielding, agents are more often Conservative-oriented, even moderately right-wing. They have been thoroughly trained and conditioned to regard a party like ours as a 'subversive' organisation, and can genuinely believe that they are fulfilling a patriotic duty in working against it. Of course, people of this disposition will find aspects of the BNP with which they can agree and identify, and this will make them far more convincing in their act of appearing loyal members. They can speak sympathetically of some BNP policies and actually mean what they say.

It is only necessary to explore the fictional world of James Bond and Bulldog Drummond to appreciate the genuine appeal of an agent's work to the loyal British patriot, serving Queen and Country in the never-ending fight against the foes of 'democracy'. It is a short cut from this agreeable fantasy to a role in curbing the real activities of the supposed Blofelds and Gold-fingers operating on the home soil!

Turning

The other method of recruitment of agents is to find them already inside the organisations targeted for infiltration and to 'turn' them. This involves skilful exercises in psychology at which the heads of security services are usually trained and experienced masters. The agent to be recruited has in all likelihood joined the organisation for perfectly genuine reasons but has come to have doubts about his previous loyalties. The loyalty doubt may be ideological or it may be about the existing leadership; or in fact it could simply turn on some particular colleague with whom there has been a quarrel. Hollingsworth and Fielding homed in on this tendency:-

"People usually work for MI5 as agents because they are disillusioned for ideological reasons. They have lost faith politically or regret their past actions... Some turn because of personality clashes within the group and want to take revenge against former comrades, while others are motivated by cash payments. Then there are those who enjoy the thrill of doing important, glamorous-seeming secret work for MI5 and taken into its confidence.

"By far the most effective method of hiring an agent is to describe the proposition in terms of how it will help them. In running a check, MI5 may discover that he or she has committed a minor legal transgression, has financial problems or needs a job. The mention of such a factor subtly during conversation is often beneficial, though some argue it is tantamount to blackmail. If the pressure is on, MI5 will also manufacture problems for the target. 'Sometimes,' a former officer told The Guardian, 'the position is created for a man so that MI5 can come along and help him – a bit like breaking a man's leg so that you can offer him a crutch.' "

Where a person is turned as a result of loss of ideological faith, at least his previous adherence to that faith has trained him in what has to be said and done to convince people it is still alive. However, the targeted recruit may indeed still adhere to the faith but has become soured because of some other, perhaps personal, factor. In that case it is easier still for him to maintain a convincing facade to his colleagues in the party. He still believes in what the party stands for; he has only lost confidence in certain individuals.

This latter type of recruit is of a kind to whom 'controllers' of government security services are well accustomed, and they know exactly how to deal with such a person.

Soviet spymasters seeking out collaborators among Britain's social élite always took care never to present their proposition to the targeted individual in such a way as to seem as if he were being asked to betray his country. On the contrary, he would be serving his country in a 'higher' sense if he worked for the Soviet Union and World Socialism! That was usually the tack. Likewise, the intelligent approach to a vulnerable BNP member would be to make clear that he is not being required to act against his party, or indeed his patriotic faith; he is simply being offered a chance to serve party and faith in a better way! If this offer happens to coincide with some arrangement that is beneficial to him financially, or spares him some grief with which he might otherwise be threatened (imprisonment or exposure for some sexual peccadillo, perhaps) it becomes all the more difficult to resist. Conscience can dovetail with personal advantage, and everyone is happy!

It will thus be seen that agents and infiltrators can come in a variety of forms. In one case which I suspect, I believe that the person in question is very definitely an ideological opponent. He is against everything the BNP stands for and his mission, quite consciously, is to damage it. He has sat in my home in the company of my wife and myself, and when engaging in nationalist talk has sounded like a not very good actor reciting lines that he has been cramming up on the night before. In other cases, however, it is possible to believe that the disrupter has quite genuine nationalist feelings but has been persuaded by subtle manipulation of his hang-ups, prejudices and resentments that someone – I, John Tyndall, for instance – is a barrier to the success of the cause he believes in, so that the result of his activity is not very different.

Incitement with a bribe

In my May 2001 article I related a case where many years ago I was approached by a stranger who spoke of people he knew who would put money into the organisation of which I was then a member if I staged a coup and took over the leadership. I then saw no reason for such a coup and declined. A year afterwards, for reasons in no way connected with any of this, I did part company with the organisation's leader and found myself the head of a new group. Just to see if this stranger was genuine, I tried to contact him at an address he had left with me. He had flown, and was never seen again. I am fairly certain to this day he was a government or police agent of some kind, and that the tactics he used to entice me into a mutiny were, and still are, standard practice.

The enemy infiltrator whose purpose it is to sabotage an organisation taps into the personal foibles of those he targets for manipulation – egotism and ambition, jealousy, a sense of inferiority, thirst for revenge for an imagined wrong – but always the overt and official excuse for conflict is a political one, usually a dispute over policy or tactics.

Political organisations which graduate beyond the tiny cell level and attain some numerical strength must of necessity be 'broad churches'. They have to accommodate people of varying opinions on some issues of detail while uniting them on just a few major essentials, such as national freedom and sovereignty and racial self-preservation. And even where these essentials are concerned there are bound to be differences of opinion on presentation, interpretation, tactics and imagery. Some will desire to see the core policies presented in bold, uncompromising language; others will prefer to have them dressed up in subtler shades and softer expression.

Parties that have attained political maturity allow for these differences, and attempt to dilute arguments over them through reasoned discussion and consensus, while leaving individuals to expound the party line in their own ways – always within certain prudent limits. Often the question of what tactics should be employed in putting policies over depends on the particular environment in which the exercise is performed. When canvassing on doorsteps at election time, presentation of policy must always be brief and language moderate. In other situations, policy might be explored more deeply and, again depending on audience, sometimes expressed in firmer tones.

Internal effects

In addition to these factors, a party must ever be vigilant to strike a balance between external and internal effects. It is a general rule of politics that the members of a party, particularly its most loyal, committed and active ones, represent a stronger consensus of opinion on the issues on which the party campaigns than is to be found among the outside public at which the party's appeal is pitched. For instance, the average Labour Party activist is almost certainly a more firmly committed socialist than the average Labour voter, and yet still more so than the floating voter whom Labour seeks to court. The Labour Party must at all times avoid the danger that, in an over-zealous bid to endear itself to as many voters as possible, it will so disillusion and alienate its dedicated active workers that the latter will desert the party in droves and leave it a mere hollow shell, with an innocent-sounding public message but little in the way of an active party organisation to take that message to the people at crucial times. This is an ever-present dilemma that every party faces, and it can only be overcome by consummate political skills at leadership level.

Such potential conflicts and contradictions in a political party provide fertile ground for exploitation by the agents of internal disruption, and it has been thus in the nationalist movement in Britain over the forty-odd years in which I have been associated with it. The disrupter neatly categorises the membership of a party in terms of 'extremists' and 'moderates'. He then sets about promoting a polarisation between these two camps – something which can be accomplished with astounding ease given the naïvety of so many members, even in organisations in which a well above-average political awareness is to be expected. Again and again, this technique has been employed to smash up nationalist groupings over the years, and it is being employed right now to divide nationalists in Britain at a time of almost unparalleled public unrest and political opportunity, which cries out that they stay together.

The truth about this recurring dichotomy between 'extremists' and 'moderates' in the same party is that it is seldom that either side is completely right or completely wrong. Of course, in the so-called 'extremist' camp there are always a few whose behaviour and utterances are so politically suicidal that they need to be cast out and sent on their way. Conversely, among the so-called 'moderates' there are some whose political convictions are so weak that they will eventually take fright and leave of their own accord – probably after some vicious TV or newspaper report that is more than they can stomach. However, leaving aside these very marginal categories, a mature party embraces people of varying degrees of militancy in both conviction and expression, using the approaches of each as circumstances require.

Those who today work to divide and neutralise nationalism in Britain are to be found constantly aggravating these differences, making them appear more insoluble than they actually are, and working to drive their adherents apart to the point where the latter feel they cannot co-exist in the same party.

The wider strategy

What has been said in this article so far should not be taken to mean that enemy infiltration of the nationalist movement is confined to one particular party. My own opinion is that it covers a wide spectrum of politics broadly classified as 'far right', and does not exclude elements of the Tory Party.

I have expressed my opinion to Steve and Sharron Edwards of the Freedom Party that certain people who played a key role in the setting up of their organisation, which emerged as a splinter from the BNP, were working to an agenda of 'divide-and-conquer' most probably master-minded at the level of the state security services. I would like to affirm straightaway that I regard Steve and Sharron as absolutely genuine nationalists, albeit that I have sometimes strongly disagreed with them. I do not believe the same can be said for all of their Freedom Party associates, however. The launching of the Freedom Party was a gift to those who seek to divide British Nationalism; it took away, in particular, a large portion of the BNP's previously strong West Midlands membership, and I have never doubted that somewhere in the background the hand of the political establishment could be found behind this.

Whither the Tories?

The current appalling state of the Tory Party, and the danger that a substantial part of its right wing could decamp at some time in the future and seek pastures new, would make it certain that this group of people is being carefully monitored through agents placed in its ranks, who would doubtless use their influence to ensure that it remains politically neutered – that is to say not aligned with anyone who is fighting the battle for race and nation with any effectiveness.

One has only to look at the chequered history of the Tory Monday Club to get an idea of the forces at work here. Every time in the past few decades when the Club looked as if it might be flirting with genuine nationalism the long lassoo of Central Office has been thrown in its direction and it has been hauled back into line, usually through the activity of liberal Tories placed in it specifically to ensure its continued subservience to the party leadership. Did the Monday Club contain MI5 agents? Like all such matters, this is impossible to prove, but I would not have the slightest doubt of it. As a protector of the liberal establishment, this government agency simply would not otherwise have been doing its job properly.

We must never lose sight of the name of the game, which is to ensure that no truly genuine or effective movement for nationalism is allowed to emerge in this country.

More lately, the Monday Club was closed down – by a ruling of Iain Duncan Smith as one of his first moves after becoming leader. Ironically, this was the man who got his job as party boss largely through the support of the Tory Right, including no doubt many Monday Club members. It is difficult to feel sorry for them!

IDS has now been ditched, and we have Michael Howard as the new Tory man of destiny. Conservatives, who seem in large measure to comprise people who would buy sand in the Sahara from the nearest glib Arab salesman, are hoping that Howard will take the party in the rightward direction that his predecessor feared to tread. There is not the slightest hope of this. I suggest that after he has had two years at the helm – possibly including another lost election – his head will be on the chopping block just as Duncan Smith's was. It could then well be that the Tory Right will find this the last straw and break ranks, if they do not do so earlier. Then what will happen?

What we can be fairly sure will happen is that they will not join forces with the BNP – unless our party has in the meantime deviated so far from genuine racial nationalism as to be but a shadow of that intended by its founders. Much more likely is that a 'new' Tory Party will be launched, possibly with some of the old nomenclature retained. And if this happens it would be equally likely that MI5 agents would have a crucial role in steering things in that direction. We must never lose sight of the name of the game, which is to ensure that no truly genuine or effective movement for nationalism is allowed to emerge in this country. If this looks like happening, it must be outflanked by the creation of a rival movement which will divert much of its support away and thus keep the forces of resistance to globalism and multi-racialism splintered.

He could be the Tories' final throw of the dice. Will he last even as long as IDS? And if he goes, then what?

And the tactics employed in this diversionary move will be familiar. We will see re-enacted the old manoeuvre of setting the 'moderates' and 'extremists' against each other. The same voices will be heard as those which now sound forth in exacerbation of divisions in the BNP itself, and the same sheep-like acquiescence will be expected.

The lure of money

And I would have little doubt that another factor would be brought into the equation. Money – in generous quantities – would be likely to be provided to oil the wheels. The old aphorism that 'everyone has their price' is nearly, if not quite, true of politics. It would be to the advantage of those creating diversions from the nationalist movement – or indeed within that movement – to provide the financial wherewithal to entice people away from their former loyalties by offers of employment, even if only on a part-time basis. I have heard it claimed that businessmen in abundance are ready to provide funding for a new 'right-wing' party if it is launched. The actual background and bona fides of those businessmen would call for diligent examination.

All this makes it interesting that a well-known mainstream journalist, Peter Hitchens, has for some time been agitating for disillusioned right-wing Tories to jump ship and form a new party – a call to which I drew attention in these columns last month. We often find ourselves agreeing with Mr. Hitchens; but in this case, as I stated, the needed party already exists. Why we should need another perhaps Hitchens knows but prefers not to tell us.

This article, necessarily long, will no doubt invite attacks, and the attacks are likely to come much more vehemently from people purporting to be on 'our own side' than from our known political opponents. The purpose of the article is to get people thinking seriously about some of the barely concealed minefields and booby traps lying in wait for our movement and cause. We should not allow knowledge of these things to induce despondency. History is moving in our direction, and the world we oppose is collapsing all around us. But we can hasten that collapse more effectively if we familiarise ourselves thoroughly with its defenders' last-ditch strategies and wiles.

The Khodorkovsky affair: an uncensored view

Considerable publicity in Britain greeted the recent decision by Russian President Vladimir Putin to investigate the business activities of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, one of the multi-billionaires frequently held up by the British media as paragons of the new 'enterprise' culture of post-communist Russia. Who is Khodorkovsky and what lies behind Putin's move against him? The following is a slightly abridged version of a radio broadcast on the subject given on the programme American Dissident Voices on the 1st November. There have also been minor deletions to the text as an insurance against prosecution under United Kingdom laws which make it a criminal offence to speak or write disparagingly of certain ethnic groups.

American Dissident Voices can be reached at <www.NatVan.com>.

IN an astounding coincidence, on the very day last week's American Dissident Voices programme on the Jewish oligarchs who dominate Russia, 'Russia Struggles to Live', was released, the 25th of October 2003, the Russian struggle for freedom reached a crucial moment with the arrest of one of those Jewish oligarchs, Mikhail Khodorkovsky. The Jewish oligarchs – and nearly all of the oligarchs are Jewish, not Russian – are a group of super-rich parasites who managed to obtain most of the natural resource and institutional wealth of Russia at rock-bottom prices during rigged privatisation auctions during the internationalist Yeltsin regime in Russia after the fall of the Soviet Union.

Russian President Putin has been taking measures to rein in the power of the oligarchs, and two of the most notorious – Boris Berezovsky and Vladimir Gusinsky – have been forced to flee the country to avoid prosecution. Berezovsky currently hides in Britain, Gusinsky in Greece.

Khodorkovsky's private jet was surrounded Saturday by camouflaged Russian Special Forces who arrested the Jewish billionaire in a dramatic confrontation at a Siberian airport. Khodorkovsky had failed to appear at a hearing, and his business associates had told the courts that he could not attend because he was on a business trip.

A MAN OF MANY ENTERPRISES

Khodorkovsky, the head of oil conglomerate Yukos and many other enterprises, had vowed that he would not go into exile, as have fellow Jewish oligarchs Boris Berezovsky and Vladimir Gusinsky. Berezovsky has been granted 'political asylum' by Britain, and Gusinsky is hiding in Greece, where so far the government there has refused to extradite him to face charges in Russia. Realists point out that a billionaire might have a fairly easy time persuading low-level bureaucrats to do his bidding in most countries, Greece included.

Khodorkovsky's plan was to use his wealth and influence to fund and promote Russian president Vladimir Putin's political opponents – but it looks like that strategy was too little, too late, and the wealthiest man in Russia (his fortune reportedly tops eight billion dollars) will now have to face charges relating to his extremely questionable financial dealings.

The prosecutor's office announced: "The head of Yukos is incriminated on committing a series of crimes, including theft by fraud on a large scale and the failure to pay taxes as an organisation and as an individual." He has also been charged with failure to abide by a court decision, fraud, forgery and embezzlement, according to wire service reports.

QUESTIONABLE DEALS

The Associated Press, with unusual candour for them, stated that "The 40-year-old Khodorkovsky, whose wealth was estimated by Forbes magazine (search) at $8 billion, is one of the most prominent of Russia's so-called 'oligarchs' – men who made huge, quick fortunes after the collapse of the Soviet Union by acquiring state property at low prices in deals whose ethics came under question. The oligarchs are greatly resented by large numbers of Russians who did not benefit from the privatisation of state property." AP just happened to forget to mention that practically all of these oligarchs are Jews, not Russians.

Khodorkovsky's ideological flip-flops are astounding – he once held a high position in the Young Communist League. His position there gave him entree into the circles needed to make some of his early deals for state property, which his detractors say he obtained for essentially nothing, using state money to cancel his private debt. His single-minded and less than ethical pursuit of wealth has even been criticised by some of his supporters. The head of Russia's Union of Entrepreneurs, Arkady Volsky, recently said that: "Indeed, earning $8 billion in just eight years is a bit over the top."

After the arrest, the press announced that Russia's "business lobby" (likely a euphemism for the representatives of moneyed Jewish interests) wanted to meet with prosecutors and the Russian president to "discuss matters." President Vladimir Putin absolutely refused. BBC News reported: "Mr Putin broke his silence over the arrest of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, chief executive of oil giant Yukos, after a lobby of the country's business leaders publicly called for a meeting with the president."

"There will be no meetings, no horse-trading with regard to the law-enforcement bodies," was Mr Putin's firm remark as reported by Interfax.

Just like the United States Government is often the only one voting with Israel in the United Nations, so also is the US Government the only one so far voicing condemnation of Khodorkovsky's arrest. The US ambassador to Russia, Alexander Vershbow, was quoted in the Taipei Times, Britain's Guardian and other papers saying that the arrest could "negatively affect" foreign investment in Russia, going on to claim that the laws are being "used selectively" by Putin to harm Khodorkovsky.

SERVANT OF JEWISH INTERESTS

Who is Alexander Vershbow? For one thing, he has staunchly defended Khodorkovsky's Yukos oil firm before, during the preliminary stages of the investigation, when he couldn't possibly have known enough to determine guilt or innocence. And, although I have been unable to verify Vershbow's ethnic background, his written record indicates that one of his main interests as ambassador is ensuring that Jewish interests come first in Russia and in promoting the Jewish version of 'racial diversity' in that land.

Vershbow has received the 'Anatoly Sharansky Freedom Award' from the Union of Councils of Soviet Jews for his efforts. That's the sort of man put in the ambassador's position by the neo-con Jews who currently rule Washington through Bush and Co.

Just three days after Putin's move against Khodorkovskiy, the Jewish-owned establishment paper the Washington Post weighed in with what might be fairly said to be the system's take on the Khodorkovskiy affair. And it's more extreme and vicious than even I imagined it would be – it constitutes a virtual re-establishment of the Cold War against Russia and the total condemnation of the Putin administration. It attempts to get conservatives and liberals alike to join in hating Putin and the new Russia: brain-dead conservatives because Putin formerly worked for the KGB, and because the current police agencies are its successors, and such imagery is almost as good as the fake atrocity stories published to get right-wing Americans to hate Iraqis; sentimental liberals because Putin is seen as reasserting Russian nationhood, and such a thing is almost as bad as the ultimate sin, racism, and is a threat to pluralism, diversity, and all the rest of the non-existent mental constructs that liberals worship.

The Post's article is by neo-con hack and former Lockheed Martin lobbyist and vice president Bruce Pitcairn Jackson, who serves the Jews through his board seat on the Project for the New American Century, a pro-war Zionist front group which planned the conquest of Iraq years before 9/11, and who also served on the Committee for the Liberation of Iraq set up by the same neo-con crowd, who ten years earlier created its prototype, the Committee for Peace and Security in the Gulf, on which Jackson also served. Jackson doesn't appear to be of Jewish ancestry, but he's obviously totally committed to the Zionist agenda and is a significant Gentile force pushing for Jewish interests in Washington's circles of power.

DECLARATION OF WAR

Jackson's Post article is even titled in a way that conveys the establishment's new declaration of war on Putin now that he has dared to show his hand against the Jews – Jackson calls his piece 'The Failure of Putin's Russia'. Let me read you a few telling passages:-

"... The 'crimes' of Khodorkovskiy are considerable in the eyes of the special prosecutor and the new regime of former KGB officers who now surround President Vladimir Putin. This has been a year in which independent media and major independent business owners in Russia have been put out of business by the strong-arm tactics of the special prosecutor and the newly vigilant Federal Security Service (FSB), the agency that succeeded the KGB. In a climate that progressive Russian business executives compare to the fearful period of the 1950s, Khodorkovskiy made the fatal mistake of expressing political opinions and having the temerity to provide financial support to opposition parties. For those who have not kept up their Russian, 'oligarch' is a term of art for 'rich Jews' who made their money in the massive privatisation of Soviet assets in the early 1990s. It is still not a good thing to be a successful Jew in historically anti-Semitic Russia. Since Putin was elected president in 2000,

RUSSIA'S SEVEN RICHEST MEN

MIKHAIL KHODORKOVSKY (Jewish), 40: worth £4.72 billion and Russia's richest man. Head of Yukos and a critic of Vladimir Putin. Arrested on October 25th, charged with fraud and tax evasion and faces up to 10 years if convicted.

ROMAN ABRAMOVICH (Jewish), 37: worth £3.3 billion. Governor of Chukotka, in the Far East. Recently merged his Sibneft oil company with Yukos and is cashing in his assets. Came to British attention buying Chelsea FC this summer.

MIKHAIL FRIDMAN (Jewish), 39: worth £2.54 billion. Co-founder of Alpha Group banking and owns part of TNK, the oil giant that recently began a joint venture with BP -- the largest single British investment in Russia.

BORIS BEREZOVSKY (Jewish), 57: worth £1.77 billion. Once the most powerful oligarch, fled Russia nearly three years ago after falling out with Putin. Soviet-era mathematician who has owned a car dealership, a media empire, Aeroflot and vast oil and aluminium holdings. Granted asylum in Britain in September and now deals in London property.

VLADIMIR POTANIN (Russian), 42: worth £944m. Head of Interros Group, a media, banking and heavy metals empire. Its Norilsk Nickel subsidiary controls the world's largest nickel and palladium deposits. Former deputy prime minister.

OLEG DERIPASKA (Jewish), 35: worth £885m. Aluminum tycoon. Controls Gaz, Russia's second biggest car maker, several bus plants and a quarter of Aeroflot. Close to the family of Boris Yeltsin.

VLADIMIR GUZINSKY (Jewish), 53: once worth more than £250m. Former theatre director who became rich redeveloping buildings in Moscow. Later built up Media Most, a media and banking empire. Arrested and stripped of his assets after falling out with Putin. Now lives in exile between America and Israel.

The facts given here are taken from a report in the Sunday Times of November 2nd. The one thing missing in the ST report is the race of the tycoons in question, which has been added in this version.

every major figure exiled or arrested for financial crimes has been Jewish. In dollar terms, we are witnessing the largest illegal expropriation of Jewish property in Europe since the Nazi seizures during the 1930s. "Unfortunately, the implications of Khodorkovskiy's arrest go beyond the suppression of democratic voices and the return of official anti-Semitism. This arrest must be seen in the context of increasingly aggressive, military and extra-judicial actions in Ukraine, Moldova, the South Caucasus and Chechnya. In the past month, Putin has demanded that Ukraine sign a concessionary economic treaty; Russian intelligence services have been detected behind election irregularities in Azerbaijan and Georgia and in influence-peddling in Moldova and Abkhazia; and Russian gunboats have confronted the Ukrainian Coast Guard in an illegal attempt to seize a valuable commercial waterway. For the balance of his first term Putin has skilfully taken advantage of America's necessary preoccupations with the war on terrorism and the liberation of Iraq. "Now Moscow and the capitals of Eastern Europe are watching carefully to see how Washington responds to this latest crackdown. If the United States fails to take a hard line in response to such a high-visibility arrest, chauvinists in the Russian Ministry of Defence and the FSB will correctly conclude that there will be no meaningful response to the reestablishment of a neo-imperial sphere of influence in the new democracies to Russia's south and west. "In addition to the expected Cold War thuggery and opportunistic financial seizures, we should expect that the new powers in Russia will rig the crucial elections in Ukraine and Georgia next year and continue to prop up the brutal dictatorship of Alexander Lukashenko in Belarus... If anyone should pay a price for the pursuit of thuggish policies, it is Putin. It's difficult to see why the US Senate would even consider repealing the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, the 1974 legislation under which Russia still must receive an annual waiver from the United States to maintain normal trade relations. On the contrary, Congress should probably consider additional sanctions. The FSB-led attack on Russian business has already cost American shareholders multiple billions in their savings.

"These losses will undoubtedly continue until some element of the rule of law returns to Moscow. The arrest of one man has sent us a signal that our well-intentioned Russian policy has failed. We must now recognise that there has been a massive suppression of human rights and the imposition of a de facto Cold War-type administration in Moscow... Obviously, there will be some in Washington who will argue that all the oligarchs are probably guilty of some unspecified crime or another, and that we would be wise not to jeopardise our relationship with Putin for the sake of one man or one company. But there are some who are probably still waiting for the facts of the Dreyfus case before jumping to conclusions. The rest of us already know that we have been played for fools."

That's pretty strong stuff from neo-con stuffed shirt Bruce P. Jackson. Jackson is using the Post to signal our politicians that the Jews want all-out war on Putin now. And it is likely that our politicians will respond to the Post and to Wolfowitz and Perle's Project for the New American Century like Fido responds to doggie bites. If you read the piece, I'm sure you noticed that Jackson put the word 'crimes' in scare quotes when referring to the charges against Khodorkovsky, and saw that in Mr. Jackson's newspeak, the word 'Jewish' can also be pronounced 'progressive' or 'independent'. And he doesn't even hide the fact that he's plumping for the interests of billionaire Jews – that's right out in the open, though he couches it in terms of the largely-exaggerated sufferings of Jews during World War II and the 19th century Dreyfus case in France, mythic images to Jews and Christian Zionists, and a sure signal that the Jewish establishment is now pulling out all the stops against Putin.

INDEPENDENT FORCE

To me, that strengthens my impression that Putin, whatever his personal ambitions, is a real independent force and now stands for Russian national liberation from the Jews. Whatever Jewish connections he may have had in the past are obviously doing him little or no good now, and may have been merely stepping stones, political attachments of a purely temporary nature, used specifically and only to get himself into a position where he could shed them and work independently.

Americans may soon have to forget all about Saddam Hussein as the 'new Hitler', just as they quickly forgot about Osama and Milosevic and Gaddafi and Khomeini and all the rest of the erstwhile opponents of Jewish international conquest – because a new man has appeared on the scene to fill that role, a man of enormous popularity among his own people, leader of a huge country with almost limitless resources, a nation which is a nuclear power in its own unquestioned right, and a country which, like the United States, has veto power at the United Nations.

Will the American people, already weakened and disheartened by the unending Zionist debacle of death in Iraq, fall for a new Jewish crusade – this time against Russia? I can tell you this: The National Alliance will be speaking out – every day and everywhere – to make sure we do not.

SIR: With reference to your November issue comment on my recent article on the BNP that was published in Right Now! magazine, I will stand corrected on some of the dates related to the history of the National Front and the earlier days of the BNP. As you point out, you were far more heavily engaged than I was for most of the period covered. The dates I gave were repeated from my memoirs, Many Shades of Black, and as I sent you a copy of the page proofs in 1999 before publishing you had the opportunity to put me right on these various dates. The fact that you did not do so was probably because you were more concerned that I should take out the name of Nick Griffin as one of the younger people whom I thought could help the growth of the BNP. This I did, bowing to your experience.

To imply that I knew nothing of what was going on during the 70s and 80s is wrong. Until 1975, I still addressed several London branch meetings of the NF and remained a member until 1977, having been one of the three people instrumental in its foundation and with A.K. Chesterton your principal supporter for subsequent membership. Also, except for a 10-year period around 1979-89, I have always subscribed to Spearhead (and several minor radical right publications) to keep informed, and over the years I am sure you will recall that I have written a dozen or more articles for your journal!

My brief from the editor of Right Now! was to give a 'warts-and-all' picture of the BNP with comment on the differences in tactics and strategy pursued by our party during your Chairmanship and that of Nick Griffin. You are entitled to disagree with my conclusions, which are basically the same as expressed in my book, but you should not read into them things which I did not say, otherwise it will only confirm the views of those who suggest you are becoming somewhat paranoid. For example, where I wrote that the RWB Festival was more like a modern holiday camp than a Nuremberg rally it was to counter the Searchlight-inspired propaganda that it was. Nowhere did I suggest, nor imply, that BNP meetings during your Chairmanship were of the latter variety. As for the

Right Now! article: John Bean replies to our Editor

BNP not having a 'leader', but a "democratically elected chairman" (and you were the latter), my concept of 'leader' here was in the Mosley sense. I should have made this clearer.

You seem to imply that there is something significant in the fact "that since 1962, whenever the internal barricades have been up, you have been on the opposite side to me." This has happened because you and I usually disagree on tactics and strategy, but certainly not in our fundamental beliefs, and because I will argue my point with you. For goodness sake, John, we are supposed to be on the same side! What an example to the majority of the BNP membership, who were not born in 1962, or 1956, we old men are giving in arguing about our past disagreements.

I read your excellent demolition of the Tory Party in your November issue and thought what a waste that we are not all pulling together. Then, apart from your criticism of me – most of which can be justified from your point of view – I find that every one of the activities reports in the back pages is again doing nothing but harm for the unity of the party. I spoke against your expulsion from the BNP, not least because you were its founder and kept the flame burning for so many years when I was non-active trying to solve personal issues, but I can see why you were expelled.

Searchlight et al must be laughing their heads off.

John Bean
Newmarket, Suffolk

EDITOR'S REPLY: A great deal could be said to refute the points made by John Bean in the above letter, but I see little purpose in opening up a prolonged argument which would lead nowhere. Perhaps the main thing that comes out of the letter is that it neatly skates over some of the most important matters I raised in my critique of his Right Now! article.

The incorrect chronology in the draft of his book is something that I cannot recall, but then it was not that important. In the context of the Right Now! article it most certainly is. He seems to be using the dates to suggest that the decline of the National Front was connected with the publicity derived from that party's marches and the confrontations with opponents which in some cases resulted, whereas there was no connection whatever, as the former occurred a long time after the latter.

Mr. Bean speaks of the differences in tactics and strategy being pursued by the BNP pre-1999 and post-1999. Again, there were no substantial differences, only ones of small detail. Since he only came into the party after the Griffin takeover, he would know little about this subject except what he had been told by Mr. Griffin and/or his supporters. The general thrust of my critique – although not said in these precise terms – was that Mr. Bean was the very last person qualified to write an article on these matters in view of his absence from the BNP during its first 17½ years, and with this in mind I find it rather surprising that he was asked by Right Now! to contribute the article and equally surprising that he accepted.

He says nothing about his considerable mistake in asserting that Nick Griffin joined the BNP before the Millwall victory – another case of an error guaranteed, if not intended, to mislead. Nor does he express any regret for his error in the matter of disciplinary action taken against people for bad behaviour. All this is just swept under the carpet.

It certainly is regrettable that older campaigners are arguing about matters long past, but this is inevitable when one of them drags up those long-past matters in order to score points relevant to the present. If John Bean does not like this, he shouldn't have done it.

As for Mr. Bean's comment that he can see why I was expelled, I think that says it all.

Jewish Supremacism (by David Duke).
Free Speech Press. Available from Spearhead Books at £16.50.

IN 1905, a new book was catalogued in the British Library. Its title was The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, and it claimed to be the secret minutes of Jewish élitists who planned to dominate the world. Most authorities now view The Protocols of Zion as an elaborate forgery concocted by agents of the Russian Czar.

Over the last century since the book's release, thousands of other books have been written on what is called the 'Jewish Question'. The vast majority of them defend the Jewish people from the forces of 'Anti-Semitism', yet still the best selling book on the Jews since 1905 has been The Protocols, which has been published in most of the world's languages. According to prominent Jewish leaders in Russia, the popularity of The Protocols has now been eclipsed by a new book titled Jewish Supremacism. Unlike The Protocols, this book is no forgery, for its author is proud of his work. He is the controversial American politician David Duke, a former member of the Louisiana House of Representatives.

Jewish leaders are extremely fearful of this book. I can illustrate the cause of their concern by giving an example of David Duke's technique in exposing what he calls Jewish supremacism.

If any prominent political person in the Western World publicly announced that Jews are frequently disloyal to nations where they live and that they view Gentiles as racially inferior, he would face excoriation as an 'anti-Semite'. Probably, he would be driven from office. Duke has no need to make such claims, for he simply quotes very prominent and powerful Jews who make his point for him.

FROM THE HORSE'S MOUTH

In the first few pages of Jewish Supremacism, Duke quotes Dr. Richard Steinlight, a former head of National Affairs for the largest Jewish organisation in the United States. Here is the quotation taken from a 2001 magazine article written by Dr. Steinlight:-

"I'll confess it at least, like thousands of other typical kids of my generation I was reared as a Jewish nationalist, even a quasi-separatist. Every summer for two months of ten formative years... I attended Jewish summer camp. There, each morning, I saluted a foreign flag, dressed in a uniform reflecting its colours, sang a foreign national anthem, learned a foreign language... and was taught the superiority of my people to the 'Gentiles' who oppressed us.

"We were taught to view non-Jews as... people less sensitive, intelligent and moral than ourselves."

This method of quoting major Jewish figures and sources is used hundreds of times in Duke's book to advance his thesis that there is a powerful Jewish supremacist element in Judaism and Zionism that threatens not only the freedom of the Palestinian people but all nations, including the United States.

Duke also uses direct quotes from the Talmud and other major Jewish sources, such as the Jewish Encyclopedia to expose a long-standing cadre of hateful, anti-Gentile Jewish supremacists. Shocking quotes are displayed from major Jewish magazines that boast of a Jewish supremacy over the media and politics of the United States. He finds disturbing and hateful words from Jewish leaders, such as Ariel Sharon, which openly support genocide, and he reveals quotations from Israeli leaders who equate Zionism and Nazism. Of course, he also cites many prominent Gentiles of historical and contemothers filed a formal complaint to the Russian Prosecutor General and asked for the book to be classified as anti-Semitic and thus illegal. After a year of close examination (they painstakingly verified all 669 of the documentations), the Russian Government shocked the Jewish community by officially declaring that the book is not anti-Semitic. Jewish members of the Duma then introduced new legislation aimed at outlawing Jewish Supremacism, but it failed by a few votes.

Duma (Parliament) and has prompted Levinsky, Goldman and other leading Jews to seek its ban under old Soviet laws forbidding 'anti-Semitism'.

Since then, the book has been sold on thousands of street corners across the breadth of the Russian Federation and has now topped an incredible 500,000 in print.

Translated into most of the Eastern European languages, the book has won Duke many academic awards for its scholarship, including an honorary Doctorate awarded by President's University, the second largest university in the nation of Ukraine.

Subsequently the university itself published a best-selling Ukrainian edition. In May of 2003, Free Speech Press published the English version of Jewish Supremacism, accompanied by a storm of interest and controversy. Jewish leaders are horrified that it is well on its way to becoming the best-read book in the world on Zionism.

SMEARS BACKFIRED

Although Zionist organisations have tried to use Duke's media characterisation as a 'white supremacist' to discredit his book, so far their exploitation of his early-life involvement in a KKK group has only backfired by making the book and its author more newsworthy. Attacks by the ADL and other pro-Zionist groups have led to sensationalist news coverage, causing even greater interest and confounding those who desperately wanted Duke's book to die a quiet death.

porary times, but the Jewish quotations and sources have the greatest power. Frankly, they are so convincing that Jewish leaders have sought to get the book banned in many nations.

Interestingly, Jewish Supremacism was published first in Russia, the same nation that gave birth to The Protocols of Zion. In 2000 it quickly became a best seller throughout the entirety of the former Eastern bloc. It even sells briskly in the corridors of the Russian

EXPOSING THE REAL RACISTS

David Duke decries the label of white supremacist and says that while he certainly desires the preservation of his own heritage he seeks no supremacy over others. He maintains that those who scream most hatefully against him are themselves guilty of the most extreme and powerful supremacism on earth: Jewish supremacism.

When Duke lectured in some Persian Gulf nations last year, Zionist leaders attempted to undercut his support by allegations of 'racism'. Those organised efforts had little affect on the overflow, mixed-race audiences that cheered almost his every word. As a former university professor and a writer who has lectured occasionally on behalf of the people of Palestine, I approached David Duke's book out of a curiosity elicited by the intense Zionist efforts to suppress it. Actually, I had readily accepted the negative portrayals of him I had read in the Jewish press, but I wanted to see what all the commotion was about. Why were they so anxious to ban this book and slander its author? To my great surprise I discovered a most amazing book!

David Duke stated that he had set out with the ambitious goal of writing the most powerful exposé of Zionism ever put into print. With extreme scepticism of his ability to accomplish such a lofty goal, I began to read. Three days later, as I turned the last page, I knew that he had accomplished more than he dreamed. Rather than just assembling his facts in a dry textbook fashion, David Duke presents his thesis in the first person. It is the personal narrative of a thoughtful and enlightened young man who is sympathetic to Zionism, but is awakened to its supremacist core that not only threatens the Palestinians but his own beloved European-Americans as well. I could not find even a trace of hatred, intemperance or true anti-Semitism in this book. However, by extensive quoting of important Jewish leaders and Zionist source materials, Duke exposes a deep well of Jewish supremacist hatred against gentiles. He points out that one is unfairly labelled an 'anti-Semite' simply for exposing the hateful pronouncements of Jewish supremacists.

ABSOLVES SOME JEWS

The book is clearly not anti-Semitic. Duke goes at length to point out that not all Jews are supremacists, and that the supremacists not only endanger the Gentile world but threaten innocent Jews by exposing them to an inevitably hostile Gentile reaction. The book is in fact dedicated to the late Dr. Israel Shahak, a Holocaust survivor and Israeli peace activist whose life was dedicated to saving both Jews and Gentiles from the dangers of Jewish supremacism. David Duke cleverly turns the term 'anti-Semitic' on its head by quoting columnist Joseph Sobran's remark that the 'anti-Semite' is no longer someone who dislikes Jews; he is now simply a person whom the Jews don't like.

Jewish Supremacism begins with David Duke's first great epiphany on the Jewish question: his learning that the Russian Revolution wasn't Russian but overwhelmingly Jewish. Using powerful documentary evidence, he shows that the Bolshevik Revolution was actually financed and led by Jews who had their own agenda against the Czar. He quotes from familiar and impeccable sources such as Winston Churchill, the dispatches of the American ambassador to Russia, the chief of British Intelligence and copious Jewish sources. For instance, he quotes a report from the National Archives of the United States showing that of the 384 members of the first Bolshevik government, there were more than 300 Jews and only 13 ethnic Russians.

How could such an enormous fact of history be hidden? Duke asks. His rhetorical question is answered throughout the rest of this book by giving the clear evidence of the tremendous power exercised by Jewish supremacists in government, media and the academic establishment. Not only has the pre-eminent Jewish role in the Bolshevik Revolution and its Gulags been quietly suppressed, but also even the very existence of Jewish supremacism has been kept from public awareness. One can freely discuss the evils of white supremacism, but if one dares to expose Jewish supremacism, one will assuredly be labelled an 'anti-Semite', the ultimate term of opprobrium in modern society. In very effective arguments, Duke points out that one is not called 'anti-Christian' for exposing the excesses of the Inquisition or 'anti-Muslim' for opposing the intolerance of some extremist Moslem sects. But dare simply to quote the hateful statements of important leaders of Judaism and Zionism, and in many countries one could well wind up in prison for 'hate speech'.

One of the fascinating themes to which David Duke repeatedly turns is the easily documented Jewish supremacist strategy of fostering extreme chauvinism among their own people while at the same time working to break down the group loyalty of the Gentiles among whom they live. Jewish leaders have long made clear that Jewish communities often have agendas that conflict with their Gentile hosts. Duke describes the struggle over those agendas as similar to the contest of two football teams. One team cultivates an extreme group loyalty through a chronic recital of Gentile persecution and an accompanying 'chosen-people' supremacist vision. The other is instilled with guilt and the idea that teamwork is immoral. The main Jewish holidays are dominated by the recounting of Gentile persecutions, and the Holocaust has now achieved almost a religious significance in Jewish life. Duke quotes many Jewish leaders proclaiming Jewish superiority and the need for their race to preserve its racial genotype. Even today, Israel will grant instant citizenship to an atheist Jew from New York, but forbids Palestinians who were born in Israel to return. Israel also forbids marriages between Jews and Gentiles.

While Jewish supremacists have these supremacist policies for their own people, they relentlessly work to break down the immigration laws of other nations. While they preach multi-culturalism and diversity for almost every other country in which they dwell, they themselves support and expect Americans to support a Zionist State, dedicated exclusively to the Jewish people, religion and culture.

INFLUENCE ON MEDIA AND GOVERNMENT

In chapters on Jewish influence over the American mass media and government, Duke offers extensive documentation that exceeds almost anyone's suspicions. Major Jewish sources are quoted which boast of their takeover and control of Hollywood, the news media and the most sensitive part of the Government of the United States. For instance, Duke quotes a major Israeli newspaper bragging about the fact that Jews loyal to Israel make up seven out of the eleven members of the secretive and sensitive National Security Council (NSC). The article goes on to assert that "America no longer has a government of Goyim" (Gentiles). Duke also quotes many US presidents and high government officials who have dared to speak out about the Jewish supremacy over the establishment. After thoroughly documenting Jewish supremacy in government and media, he shows how their media power is used to stifle public knowledge and understanding of this critical issue. Any legitimate criticism of Jewish Supremacism is labelled 'anti-Semitism', and the Jewish supremacists almost exclusively define that term.

In particularly interesting passages, Duke recounts how that when he looked up the term 'anti-Semitism' in some popular encyclopaedias, he found that the articles and recommended reading lists were authored entirely by Jewish zealots! In every conflict with Gentiles, Jews are always portrayed as completely innocent while Gentiles are portrayed as totally evil. Duke suggests that the chronic portrayal of Gentiles as inherently evil toward Jews is for Gentiles the equivalent of 'blood libel' for Jews.

Duke makes a compelling case that the nation of Israel is the doctrine of Jewish supremacy put into action. In startling documentary evidence from Israel, he shows that some of the early Zionist founders of the country readily co-operated with Nazi Germany, praised Nazi policies and claimed that their own ideology was similar. He also quotes major Jewish figures in Israel who have had the courage to condemn Israel's Nuremberg-style racial laws, such as former Israeli Supreme Court member Haim Cohen, thus:-

"The bitter irony of fate, which has led the same biological and racist laws propagated by the Nazis and which inspired the infamous Nuremberg laws to serve as a basis of Judaism within the state of Israel."

With these kinds of powerful quotes, it is no wonder that Zionists around the world are extremely fearful of this book.

ON ISRAEL TERROR

Americans will find the last chapter on Israel of particular interest. Duke unveils the long Israeli record of terrorism. He documents the horrendous terror waged against the Palestinians; he also exposes Israel's long record of terrorism and treachery against its greatest benefactor, the United States! From major Jewish sources, he recounts the Israeli terrorist attacks against America in the Lavon Affair, in which Israeli agents set off bombs in American installations in Egypt in a treacherous attempt to provoke America into war against that nation. Duke presents copious evidence exposing the deliberate, murderous Israeli attack on the USS Liberty in which 34 Americans were killed and 172 grievously wounded. The terrible damage inflicted on the United States by Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard is also recounted.

Jewish supremacy in the American media and government has suppressed any outcry against Israel's treachery. The Jewish supremacists have even been able to prevent a formal Congressional investigation into the attack on the USS Liberty. Duke makes the powerful point that millions of dollars of American aid continue to flow to Israel even after its treacherous attacks. He writes that supplying this aid is the moral equivalent of sending military aid to Japan after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Duke also shows how the Zionist domination of American foreign policy led directly to America's 9/11 catastrophe and a whole new series of foreign policy moves that are leading to disaster. This timely book shows the Jewish supremacist power behind the Iraq War, the manipulation of the President and the American people with false information, and the horrendous damage the war has done to our economy and even our security. Duke shows how the war is costing us hundreds of billions of dollars, continues to spill the blood of our military men and certainly increases world hatred and terrorism against America.

In one of the most shocking chapters of his work, Duke reveals the damning evidence of Israeli treachery in the 9/11 attacks. He shows that a massive Israeli spy ring was uncovered and apprehended in the months before and after the attacks, and that some of the Mossad agents had actually monitored the hijackers, including the leader Mohammed Atta (five Israeli agents lived on his street). Warning messages of the impending attacks were sent to Israeli firms with offices both in Israel and the World Trade Centre. A group of Mossad agents was arrested on 9/11 after they were found to have been filming and cheering the attacks while they occurred. After they had been held for a few months, Zionist Michael Chertoff of the US Department of Justice released all the members of the Israeli spy ring and allowed them to return to Israel – out of the reach of Congressional 9/11 investigators.

It is impossible to give the reader more than a glance into the depth and power of this incredible book. Practically every paragraph is a revelation. There is so much more that I could write about: detailing how the Holocaust has cynically been used as a Zionist tool in heightening Jewish solidarity and deflating criticism of Zionism and Israel; how Jewish supremacists have used immigration as a weapon of conquest, not only in Palestine but in the Western World as well. I was fascinated by Duke's expose of Sigmund Freud as a secret Jewish supremacist who thought of himself as a Hannibal destroying the foundations of the Christian church and the European family as Hannibal had sacked Rome. I could go on and on, but I will leave these discoveries to you when you read this amazing book.

After I completed the book, I wanted to find out if it had the same affect on others as it had on me. I gave it to two long-time friends at the university where I taught for 11 years. One has conservative leanings; the other is decidedly liberal; and I would describe both of them as sympathetic to Israel. Both were so fascinated that they could hardly put the book down, and one became so engrossed that he missed his regular two o'clock class. They both agreed that Duke's book is one of the best-argued that they have ever read, and used the identical term of 'amazing' to describe it. My conservative friend commented that many quotations were so shocking that he began to check out the references and found them all to be accurate. "Hell!" he said, "If only half the documents Duke cites are authentic, there is enough evidence here to start a revolution."

PERSECUTION OF AUTHOR

Throughout history, books that have challenged the power structure or the prevailing world-view have frequently led to the persecution of their authors. That is true of Duke as well. In the past two years since the Russian release of his book, he has been the target of intense government investigation and scrutiny. As he was finishing his English edition, he toured the Middle East and appeared on the Al-Jazeera satellite network.

Newsweek magazine in November of 2002 revealed that the US State Department tried to prevent his appearance. Within 30 days of the Government's illegal attempt to violate this US citizen's free speech rights, the US Department of Justice decided to prosecute Duke on tax and financial matters.

THE LIBERTY
Hole caused by Israeli torpedo

The official who authorised the prosecution was none other than Michael Chertoff, the same Zionist who had earlier set free the Israeli spy ring which cheered the 9/11 attacks. These Mossad agents were allowed to return to Israel, outside the reach of congressional 9/11 investigators. After reading his book, you will certainly understand why Duke has been persecuted by the Zionists in the US Government and why they seek to ban this book. His imprisonment is testimony to the power of the book!

Perhaps the best way I can describe the reaction to David Duke's book is to use George Bush's infamous Iraq War terminology, "shock and awe." No reader of Jewish Supremacism can digest this book without being shocked by the powerful and convincing quotations and documents he assembles, and awed by his masterful writing skills in putting it all together in a fascinating, logical and well-organised literary masterpiece that will forever change your view of the world. David Duke achieved his goal of writing the most powerful exposé of Zionism ever written. But I think he has done far more than that; I think he has created the very instrument that will topple Jewish supremacy. This is more than a book; it is a path to liberation!

The more rapidly this book is spread around the world, the faster that the Palestinians, and all the rest of us, will be set free!

THESE DAYS, examples of stupidity are pretty thick on the ground. The saga of the 'racist' police trainees featured in last month's 'What We Think' column was a classic example, more in the governmental and media reaction than in the story itself.

Not being a complete idiot like Mr. Blair, I was unsurprised to discover that police cadets are not lentil-eating, Hampstead-dwelling Guardian readers. Rather than being viewed as 'racism' though, such outbursts should be treated as manifestations of the yobbery which is part and parcel of the general coarsening of society over the past twenty years.

It says something for the noxious priorities of the BBC that a 'How Awful We All Are' exposé gets the publicity that is always denied to poor pensioners, thousands of whom will die needlessly due to fuel shortage this winter. Likewise, the British people must be largely asinine to permit recent incomers from across the globe to receive benefits and advantages that are largely denied to their own sons and daughters. But most, after a few grumbles, settle down in their seats to watch Coronation Street or some other meretricious soap opera again.

As opposed to this farcical non-story, anyone who wants to understand what racial hatred and ethnic cleansing really mean would do well to study the latest news from Gaza and the West Bank, where robot bulldozers will soon be going into action. Essentially, Israel will be deploying creations only before seen in Hollywood science fiction epics such as Terminator and Star Wars, to demolish Palestinian homes and ancient olive or orange groves.

'Bulldozer' hardly conveys what these monstrosities are like. The machines are grey, the size of a small house, armed with a machine gun and armour-plated from top to bottom. Each one will be constructed at the Caterpillar plant in Illinois at a cost of $1 million dollars apiece. The American taxpayer is picking up the tab, naturally.

You will not be hearing much about these 'killdozers' from any establishment media outlet, whose controllers prefer instead to focus on mere name-calling by foolish young men. But the press wolf pack does not just restrict itself to such small fry. Even the great and powerful must tread the line.

And we, the public, are inane enough never to ask why some leaders are singled out for demonisation. We can hardly accept that a few politicians may be hated more for their virtues than their vices. The Observer's editorial of 2nd November was a case in point. The paper immediately rushed to take the side of imprisoned privatisation billionaire Mikhail Khodorkovsky against President Putin, thundering:-

"Who does Vladimir Putin think he is? Is he the autocratic former KGB man or the would-be reformer and liberaliser of Russia? Is he the westward-leaning ally of President Bush and Tony Blair, or someone whose real affection is for the bad old days of the Soviet Union? In the aftermath of the Yukos affair and the arrest of Russia's richest man, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the question needs answering. Now is crunch-time for Mr Putin."

Later, the leader writer went on waspishly to describe Putin as: "the man who has kept a stranglehold on Russia's media freedoms." Though most of its (educated) readership are too foolish to realise that the 'freedom' enjoyed by The Observer is just the licence to publish a very narrow, almost a pre-set range of opinion.

The so-called 'free' press

In spite of The Observer's alleged editorial independence, isn't it quite likely that 'Lord' Bob Gavron, multi-millionaire New Labour donor, has some input into what is published – and more importantly – what isn't published? Whether the owners are old school, like Lord Rothermere, newcomers such as porn man Richard Desmond or the Australian/American citizen Rupert Murdoch, pretty much the same rules will apply across the board.

Press democracy? Fiction and hypocrisy! This sort of 'democracy' was well summed up by the comments of the prosecutor during Pauline Hanson's trial in Australia when he complained

HOW FOOLISH WE ARE!

IAN BUCKLEY looks at some of the sillier news items of the past month that she was creating "uncertainty in the electoral process" by daring to offer an alternative to the complacent and corrupt duopoly that misgoverns that country.

Well, it's nice to know that The Observer has such solicitude for the well-being of one moneyed oligarch, after the degradation and looting of Russia on a gigantic scale by his peers. Are these supposed leftist liberals now in sympathy with the worst aspects of capitalism? Even Khordorkovsky's alleged desire for 'democracy' probably merely means that he would like a Levy and Blair-type arrangement, with big money giving direct access to influence and power.

Of course, the rhetorical question posed by the paper, 'Who does Putin think he is?' has a simple and obvious answer. He's Russia's leader – as opposed to a wholly dubious robber baron, whom the media establishment in the US and Britain apparently thinks should really run the country! Whatever his faults, Putin – unlike the leaders of Britain and America – has some patriotic feelings and concern for the well-being of his people.

The arrest of Khodorkovsky by Russian police greatly offended the high and mighty, including leading neo-con Richard Perle, the Prince of Darkness himself, which in itself shows how right Putin was to make this move. Perle called for the expulsion of Russia from the G8 organisation as revenge for daring to lock up a corrupt wealthy man.

Part of Israel's 'ethnic cleansing' programme

Perle's reaction is understandable enough. It is called racial solidarity, and we would do well to emulate the attitude more. Incidentally, if Putin really is serious about breaking the power of the oligarchs who came to dominate Russia after the fall of Communism – and who have already siphoned off billions of the country's wealth to American and Israeli banking syndicates – then the consequences will be unpredictable and dangerous, given the utter crazies in control of the US at the present time.

The prophetic words written over forty years ago by Fr. Leonard Feeney, a traditionalist Roman Catholic priest, sum up the situation. In his The Point magazine of September 1958, surveying the foreign policy of the US and Britain towards the Middle East, and triumphant Zionism in general, Feeney said:-

"It has cost England her empire. And it has put that other chief Zionist supporter, the United States of America, face to face with a Third World War – one that looms like a terror out of the Apocalypse, and that will provide the most fantastic chapter yet in the unfinished story of Zionism."

So be warned, readers, that mere foolishness is one of the factors that can lead a trail to Armageddon!

IMMIGRANTS IN MAINLAND EUROPE: A READER'S OBSERVATIONS

BACK IN JULY, there appeared an article in Spearhead penned by Antony Milne, headed 'Can Europe Save Us?' Its argument seemed to be that there could be a hidden blessing in Britain's membership of the EU, in that measures to control immigration on the Continent were, in the writer's opinion, firmer than here. Not only was Mr. Milne's reasoning faulty but even his facts were far from correct.

The article mentioned five ships that had begun patrolling the coastlines of Italy and Spain; five thousand miles of coast to be patrolled day and night – without making allowances for dry-docking and maintenance! This alone should suffice to show up this exercise as merely a face-saving and vote-catching ploy to placate the nationalists of Europe and, it might be hoped, deter them from voting for the only people who have the long-term interests of their respective nations at heart.

Recently I returned from three weeks in Germany. I found that the small town in Southern Bavaria which had been my home for some eighteen years, was already besieged with immigrants from Africa. An asylum home had been set up in an abandoned house; all facilities of the best, naturally, for these visitors! Crime is on the increase and several local 'maidens' have already taken up with the newcomers.

My endeavours to clarify the situation were swept aside with the customary liberal gloss that I was 'prejudiced'. Of course I am! I lived amongst these people for fourteen years!

In some schools in Dusseldorf the level of foreigners – mostly black or Balkan – is reaching the 40 per cent mark. A liberal school mistress who had suffered a nervous breakdown revealed in front of the television cameras that black pupils, some as young as twelve, made suggestive remarks to her. She had been sexually manhandled, but when she attempted to remonstrate with the malefactors she was howled down with cries of 'Nazi whore'!

Mr. Milne seems to believe that Euro countries have tougher immigration laws than we. It could well be, but it is not the law that counts here but its implementation and execution. Several policemen in Germany confided to me that they have already received from 'on high' the recommendation not to be too harsh with the Blacks, especially in the towns with a high proportion of them, for fear of 'disturbances'. And this in a fully armed police force!

BOATLOADS COMING IN

And now for my pièce de résistance: from the newspaper Dolomiten, of Bozen in the South Tyrol. This came from a report published on 24.06.03.

Daily, there are arriving on the shores of Lampedusa and Sicily overladen boats with 'refugees' from Black Africa. The deportation of such 'unwanted subjects' does not function. Ex-ministress Livia Turco said: "At least 62,000 foreigners are remaining in Italy, despite having received orders to depart. The courts are absolutely jammed with the paper war being conducted on their behalf by unscrupulous and greedy lawyers."

The number of foreigners in Italy with permission to reside has doubled since 1993 to 1.5 million; to this must be added the (at least) half-million illegal entrants.

Now this is published in an Italian newspaper. It has not been rebutted or refuted by the Government, which is said to be 'right wing', with fascist elements in its ranks; and it can be taken as true.

In Germany, the police have powers to stop and search; but there, as here, there can be seen youngish Blacks driving the very latest BMW or Mercedes, coated with gold chains and with radios playing the latest rap rubbish; and yet no one is holding them up and demanding to know where and how they have obtained the money to finance this luxurious life-style.

Gangs of gypsy children run amok in department stores in Munich, and when the police intervene there is the usual cry of 'Nazis'; the local children's organisation swings into action; the culprits are all under-age and must be 'counselled', not punished. Any attempt to bring them to account is thus foiled. Even when they have no papers, there is nothing more the police can do – their fellow citizens in many cases demanding that, in view of Hitler's treatment of the Gypsies, they should be 'understood'. Apparently, the 'Hitler' complex lasts for decades, and no amount of 'democratisation' can eliminate this deep-rooted and seemingly ineradicable fear of all things German – except of course the social welfare hand-outs!

Mr. Milne's description of the situations in Holland, Belgium and France was at a variance with the facts. The situations in all three countries are almost as bad as here, with one important difference: far more nationals of these countries are likely to resent this invasion and are prepared to speak out against it – in marked contrast to the all-too-often-heard British comment: "Well, what can one do about it?" True, in Holland the authorities can decide within twenty-four hours whether an applicant for asylum will be allowed in. Whatever the decision, however, the enormous number of degenerates who assist the invasion tide rise to the occasion and grant the asylum-seekers board and lodging, meanwhile assisting them with appeals and legal assistance. The net result is that very few, if any, leave; if they do, they simply travel over the border to Belgium, make the usual noises about Belgian exploitation of the Congo, and the authorities are more than likely to fall over and sign all and every petition to keep them there.

As far as I am aware, the foreigners in France are 'ghettoised' to a far greater degree than in any other West European state, but this in no way detracts from the sheer number arriving daily. They are pouring in from Spain, Italy, Portugal and Belgium. The French used to argue with us in Africa that if a Black could speak French that made him a Frenchman. I often thought of the Duke of Wellington and his remark, being asked if he were Irish, having been born in Ireland, that being born in a stable did not make a man a horse!

Mr. Milne closes by stating that we must recognise the EU as a fait accompli. Sure, set up and organised by political spivs and shysters: Bangemann, Prodi, Lambsdorff, to name just some of those from Germany and Italy who come to mind. These are the men who informed us that if we did not join their Union there would be another European war! This was a colossal semantic jump without any foundation, but the suckers fell for it and, baa-ing wildly, headed for the voting booths, convinced that they were averting a disaster worse than the fall of Constantinople.

But I have news for Mr. Milne: nothing human is irreversible; nothing is eternal; nothing that cannot be amended, annulled or simply withdrawn from. Even the marriage contract, supposed to be holy, is annulled hundreds of times daily. So what is holy or irresistible about the Treaty of Rome? As we all know, it takes more than one party to make a treaty, and if one or more parties simply withdraw the treaty becomes null and void, empty and without substance.

As Britain becomes ever more ungovernable, ANTONY MILNE says...

THE recent anointment of Michael Howard as leader of the Tory Party means that democracy has finally died in Britain. The reason is simple: given the continued dominance of 'mainstream' politics, no way will any future party leader be able to govern without the consent of the huge cultural élite which is now outside government circles. This élite is now extremely numerous, and far exceeds the 100 or so members and assistants of the Government, and the thousand or so senior government officials and civil servants. Nor will a future Tory Government be able to pass any laws that supersede those coming from Europe.

Michael Howard has become leader of the Tories to whoops of joy from the press simply because he made two shrewdly considered but vital remarks: he said he would govern 'from the centre', and he emphasised his Romanian-Jewish immigrant origins. He praised the 'splendid diversity' of Britain. Liberals will now jump upon this and confirm that Britain is now a nation of immigrants who can do well for themselves here, and there will be no more despised 'rightism' in this country in any shape or form for decades to come.

The notion that the Tories were even 'right of centre'; has always been a down-right lie, since after Thatcher and the disastrous leaderships of Major, Hague and Duncan Smith the party has moved ever further to the left. It has done so because it has failed to understand the real reason why it lost the 1997 election, and it has thought it could only get back into power by emulating Labour.

But as political correctness and the blatant attacks on Britain's heritage, institutions and history have become really vicious, the Tories should in fact have moved firmly to the right. Perhaps they were wary of what happened to Labour after they were defeated in 1979. The popular myth surrounding this and subsequent defeats is that they occurred because the party had moved too far to the left and lost three more elections as a result. But history never repeats itself, and there is a danger in making false analogies.

Top commentators who used to be part of the 'Tory press', like Max Hastings, want to see the Conservatives move towards the 'centre'. But as they profess to want to see 'more democracy', one wonders how this can occur if Britain only has three major parties to begin with, and they are all in the 'centre'! The answer is obvious: too many want to see a permanent left-liberal system of government in force.

Now the slide into disorder is unstoppable, because the green light has been given to every wicked, selfish, anti-social thug to do his own thing. Sex lessons in schools have resulted in a rise in venereal disease among teenagers; gun crime amongst the imported black underclass is rampant; comedians with lavatorial humour appear regularly on TV; black 'rap' music on the radio is here to stay because the broadcasters will make sure of it.

The irony is that many of these commentators are not shy in pointing out how rapid has been the decline of Britain during the past ten years. Immigration is totally out of control and crime is skyrocketing. There has been a complete collapse of social, educational and family values. They know it and write about it, but don't seem to know why it has happened. They admit that A-levels have been so degraded that they are simply a con trick. A university degree, even from a traditional university, will also soon become meaningless when the Government's target of getting 50 per cent of all school-leavers into universities is met.

In short, our cretinous country, once considered by foreigners to have high standards in most fields, is now governed by an anti-élite (in the sense of anti-talent) clique that has given the country a blasted and blitzed appearance. Graffiti has been sprayed on virtually every urban wall and upon every train, railway wall and signal box for hundreds of miles around.

During the entire autumn period in suburban areas, you can hear fireworks going off virtually every night because of the mercenary greed of the fireworks manufacturers, who want to stuff corner shops with their products, and because of the media who over-promoted Halloween. Then, in the name of cultural diversity, the Indian community has been encouraged to celebrate its own Diwali festival. So there are yet more fireworks exploding throughout the night for weeks on end.

Most normal people in every society want high moral, social and educational standards, cultural cohesiveness and low levels of crime, and would welcome strong-arm tactics to achieve this aim. During the 1970s, popular paperback discussions of Britain's ills – which were nothing compared to those of today – tended more towards an authoritarian political solution to our problems, in the face of perceived chaos brought about by rampant trade unions, out-of-control inflation and IRA violence.

There were then few taboos about discussing immigration either. Recently released archives show that Edward Heath was alarmed about the race-relations consequences of Idi Amin's expulsion of his Asians from Uganda in 1972 and dumping them on this country. Other politicians expressed fears about the social and negative economic impact of unskilled immigration when the ethnic minority population was some way less than it is now.

When the 'green' movement emerged in the 1970s, most books started off by saying that over-population, especially in Europe, was at the root of the environmental crisis.

Power of the élites

Virtually all these arguments have been turned on their heads because of the growing power of the cultural élites to change the intellectual status-quo, and with it government policies.

What has happened in Britain has been a coup in reverse. Whereas true authoritarian states first gain control of the media, educational and cultural institutions, in Britain the opposite has happened; the liberal non-government élite dictate to the government what its policies should be by excluding from debate any rightist or nationalist sentiment and demonising any patriotic movement. The proof of this is that the term of abuse, 'Little Englander', is seldom ever used by politicians but often by journalists.

The same people have a track record as long as your arm of attacking and vilifying, not only the BNP, but every single nationalist movement that has emerged in Europe, without exception.

They also, of course, get themselves elected into politics having once been members of the cultural élite themselves. Many of the present Government were student-radical types who had been weaned on the early left-liberal cultural norms that were already emerging in the media and the universities from the 1960s onwards.

In my November article, I said that about 500 liberals run this country. But this is the hard core of influential cultural and opinion leaders who head a vast army of other connected élites that have spread out in concentric rings from the media -- now virtually 100 percent left-liberal (and not always by choice, but they know on which side their bread is buttered). There are the vast advertising and commercial élites, the heads of the professions, especially and principally the legal profession, and leaders of most public services, which are technically not part of government.

Police emasculated

Liberals don't like 'authoritarianism', which they regard as a 'statist' concept, and hence they claim to believe that society should have less powerful authority structures. The allegedly 'racist' police have been so browbeaten by the Establishment that they have virtually withdrawn from any form of public presence, and have become form-filling social workers. A former top police chief wrote recently that yobbish, riotous behaviour is commonplace in our major northern cities at night because the police abandoned all attempts at effective, bobby-on-the-beat policing. Most police chiefs, he said, desperately want more of their men on the streets, but it was simply 'not policy'. The liberal élite think it old-fashioned.

Possibly, young people see that uncontrolled immigration, without any thought for the consequences, means that the politicians don't care what happens to this country any more: a message guaranteed to perpetuate nihilism, alienation and lawlessness. Indeed, the law is even under assault from the lawyers themselves. The judges, far from upholding the law, do everything in their power to allow illegal immigrants to stay in the country; and they, the judges, represent the most obvious and sinister threat to the sovereignty of the politicians precisely because they are so similar in background, and are virtually interchangeable with them.

But clearly this country wants more political authoritarianism, not less. This is the whole purpose of gaining and holding on to political power: to exercise authority without fear or favour, and not have the country run through non-governmental and unelected cultural agencies and forces.

OFFICERS attached to Scotland Yard's Operation Trident unit, which investigates Yardie gun crime, are instructed not to refer to 'black-on-black' shootings but "gun crimes in the black community that we serve." The former phraseology is considered 'racist'.

WHILE Britain groans under a serious crime wave and police protest they cannot cope, the tale of a mother and son in Sherborne, Dorset, should be of interest. The son (10) squirted a water pistol at a woman in the street. Mum took the toy off him, apologised to the woman, and then gave her boy a severe ticking off.

But the 'victim' was not satisfied. She called the police, and within minutes two officers were on the scene and the boy was told that unless he accepted an official caution he would be prosecuted. The mother was so outraged that she refused. As a result, the son was charged and made to appear in court. His punishment, if any, is not known.

EIGHT police officers from Kent have been under investigation following a claim of 'racism' on a golfing trip to France.

A member of the public travelling on the coach taking the policemen said she heard the men share a 'racist' joke, which was broadcast over the tannoy system. She reported the incident, protesting that some 40 civilians were present and a number of them might not have appreciated the humour. A Kent Police spokesman announced to the press that the complaint was being taken very seriously.

AN ENQUIRY into allegations of 'institutional racism' in the Crown Prosecution Service has recently been completed -- at a cost of £700,000 to the British taxpayer. At the end of it all, no evidence of 'racism' was found.

TWO years ago, Warwickshire Police set up a hotline to deal with complaints about 'racism'. The round-the-clock service operated in eight languages: English, Hindi, Punjabi, Gujarati, Spanish, Urdu, Albanian and Serbo-Croat.

Last month it was announced that the service had been scrapped because in the two years it had not received a single call. The cost to taxpayers is not known.

A TWELVE-year-old tearaway from Leeds with a long crime record, including burglary, criminal damage, assault and joyriding, has been offered a £150,000 scholarship to an exclusive public school.

And Knowsley Council, on Merseyside, is spending £228,000 of the taxpayers' money to send young criminals on adventure holidays in Scotland and the Lake District. This follows the same council's decision to take a gang of hooligans to Alton Towers to keep them out of trouble at Halloween.

THE village of Merton, near Okehampton in Devon, has for years had a regular tradition of putting on pantomimes for the local kids at Christmas time. This year, the plan was to stage one called 'Snow White and the Seven Asylum-Seekers'. The panto told the story of seven asylum-seekers called Chemical Ali, Comical Ali, Back Ali, Dark Ali, Bowling Ali, Ali G. and Ali-Kiss-Angel. The seven were working illegally in a nearby quarry and living off baked beans in a cabin in the woods.

But the Commission for Racial Equality got to hear of the event and demanded that the show be cancelled. The pantomime society, known as the Merton Players, capitulated, but not before its writer, Bob Harrod, resigned from the Players in disgust at their cowardice.

REPUBLICANISM in Britain is not new nor 'modern'; least of all is it 'progressive'. It is an infantile concept that has had regular surges of support over the ages as current monarchs or royal families have acted in ways to displease – a fact which merely underlines its infantilism, for the institution of monarchy never was nor ever will be one which stood or fell on the attributes of individuals or the exigencies of one or another particular historical moment.

When a royal family member is perceived to have behaved shabbily, republican scribblers in the press will enjoy a field day just until such time as the balance is redressed by some highly popular royal event or, perhaps, the sight of a royal on the receiving end, rather than the giving end, of the shabbiness. All this demonstrates just the shallowness and caprice of 'public opinion', swayed hither and thither by the impact of today's news – huge in the public's narrow perspective but usually tiny in terms of its historical importance. A Palace flunky sells a salacious 'inside' story to one of the tabloids. Ergo, the republican issue is once again reopened, and the Guardian-reading classes chatter with fresh animation. Then an impressive royal pageant comes along, such as the one marking the hundredth birthday of the late Queen Mother, and the debate goes cool again – as if these ephemeral developments had the slightest relevance to the merits of the institution of royalty per se. Again, this is not new. The treatment by George IV of his wife (locked out of Westminster Abbey during his coronation) prompted anti-royal utterances from the pens of Byron and Shelley, just to mention two, but it all blew over as memories faded.

Of course, there have been thinkers and writers whose commitment to republican ideals has been more solidly founded. Thomas More wrote of such an ideal in his Utopia when he was a courtier of Henry VIII. Milton, one of our greatest scribes, was labelled by Dr. Samuel Johnson as "an acrimonious and surly republican." Even in Victorian times, when British imperial power was at its zenith and the Queen giving her name to that era was seen as the symbol of all that that power represented, republicanism enjoyed brief revivals in both fashionable and popular circles, first with the campaigns of the Chartists and later in the writings of William Morris.

Republican assumptions

At its more serious level, republicanism has always been based on two cardinal assumptions. The first is that it is wrong for any individual to wield special power and influence, and enjoy wealth, pomp and adulation, purely by accident of birth and not as things earned by merit and achievement. Why, republicans will ask, should this be permitted?

To this question there is an answer at the same time almost absurd in its simplicity and profound in its good sense: why not? At the end of the day, the measure of all such institutions and laws is their overall political, social and, above all, national utility. Is the nation weakened or enhanced by such a tradition? Criteria of fairness or justice, least of all of social equality, simply do not come into it. And from this proceeds another question even more important: Is there any evidence, historical or empirical, that the status enjoyed by monarchs is any the less admirably put to use in the public service than that enjoyed by politicians elected by universal franchise within a system based on political parties?

This brings us to the second assumption underlying republican theory: that

IN FANCY DRESS AGAIN!
Here Prince Charles is toggled up to visit a mosque. People like him have been spawned by royal families across the centuries, but they are irrelevant to the issue of monarchy versus republicanism.

monarchs, being largely people of mediocre human attributes, are not fit for the privileges they inherit. But are parliamentarians of the kind spawned by our 'democratic' political institutions any the less mediocre or any the more fit? In certain societies, notably the aristocratically constituted ones of 18th and 19th century Britain, where the franchise was much more limited, and that of the early United States, where the same limitations applied, this just might have been so; but the matter is debatable at least. Whole legions of political mediocrities, some undeniably corrupt, emerged in both countries in those times; they were, on the other hand, balanced by some men of exceptional talent and statesmanship. But in Britain and the USA today the latter are almost extinct – probably excluded from office by the very nature of the prevailing political system and culture, while the former are the norm. It was once famously said that a diplomat is a person sent abroad to lie for his country; it could even more accurately be maintained that a parliamentary or congressional member is one elected by virtue of lying for his party and constrained to do the same when in office!

Russia: Tsar and Duma

Pre-Communist Russia is often held up as the incarnation of monarchy in its absolute form – long abandoned in Britain and rejected by the vast majority of even the most ardent royalists here. Tsar Nicholas II not only possessed all the ceremonial accoutrements of a king-emperor but actually wielded total political power. He was man of modest capabilities and lacking in any great force of character. So what? He was confronted with the agitation of a Duma consisting of several hundreds of people of whom the exact same might have been said! And while in the case of Nicholas it could be argued without fear of contradiction that, with all his limitations, he was a man genuinely dedicated to the good of his country and people, his parliamentary deputies consisted in no small part of political adventurers, liars and crooks, a substantial number of whom sought only to destroy Russia as a national entity in order to submerge it in a Marxist world order. Which, in all sanity, was the lesser evil?

For a brief time, that Russia found an outstanding leader in Pyotr Stolypin, who carried out a series of dynamic reforms which enormously improved the condition of the country's vast peasantry – until his work was cut short by assassin-assassination in 1911. Stolypin attained his office by royal appointment. The likelihood that he would have ever clawed his way to it through the jungle of parliamentary politics, with their petty aims, their incessant intrigues, their worship of mediocrity and the premium they set on talk – such a likelihood is remote. The example of Britain, America and almost all the other nations of today's 'democratic' West underline this.

Today in Britain the debate on monarchy excludes any question of such absolutism (though there will some who will argue that it should not); it revolves solely around the idea of whether the institution of constitutional monarchy, with its very tightly restricted powers, should be preserved. However, much the same criteria still apply. Is a monarch, albeit with the obvious personal limitations acknowledged earlier, any the less fit to enjoy status and privileges than the rag-bag of nonentities elevated to power through the ranks of our current Labour, Tory and Liberal Democrat parties? Or might such a person in fact be somewhat more so – given that she or he, by reason of accession through inheritance, is much more likely to be a disinterested public servant, particularly so for absence of career ambition, the possession of assured financial security and non-commitment to any political party?

The handling of scandal

The goings-on in the private life of Prince Charles, while not admirable, are – again – nothing new. Private scandal has followed royal members across history. The only difference today is that that scandal is much more likely to suffer public exposure than in the past. It is not only that the mass media are vastly more powerful and developed; it is also that a modern superstition has taken root by which exposure is demanded as of right. Why should the Prince of Wales get away with it and others not? Again there is a simple reply: because the national interest requires that, in certain circumstances, there are sound reasons why he should do so. Is this hypocrisy? Yes it is, but in all affairs of state since time immemorial hypocrisy has had a necessary place. It must be said again: the national interest overrules all. This is still today invoked as justification for cover-ups of every kind where they involve public servants outside the royal domain, but 'democracy' somehow dictates that the royals should be exempt from such favours.

But was the old hypocrisy really worse than the new? Roger Scruton, writing on recent Palace revelations in The Spectator of November 15th spotlighted the latter:-

"The demoralisation of the public provides a new financial opportunity,

OUR NATIONAL HERITAGE

Windsor Castle (above) and Balmoral (below): they don't just belong to the royal family; they belong to all of us.

and editors are too jealous of their empires not to seize it. Moreover, the depraved imagination of the British public provides an effective protection against censorship; loathsome gossip is no more to be censured in Britain than throwing Christians to the lions was in Rome. In both cases we are merely giving the public what it wants."

The Royal Estate

Much has been made in recent debate of the considerable assets possessed by royalty and the great public expense involved in keeping royalty in the manner to which it is accustomed. I have always thought this to be a silly argument rooted in the tradition of resentful bile long characteristic of the British Left. If all the royal assets and all the royal subsidies were to be done away with and the resulting savings distributed equally among the population, the actual benefit to each one of the 60 million inhabitants of this country would be so minute as to mock serious consideration. It should be plain to the meanest thinker that this royal wealth is not maintained for the personal advantage or luxury of the royal family themselves; its purpose is to provide the grandeur and mystique believed – in my opinion rightly – to be essential to such an institution. Liberal intellectuals no doubt think it pointless for royals not to be treated as 'ordinary' people, so that if they are to be tolerated at all they should dwell in something equivalent to suburban semis and ride around the streets on bicycles. As with so many things, more wisdom is to be found in the heads of factory workers, taxi-drivers, farmers and members of the armed forces, who want their head of state and her clan – at least where Britain is concerned – to be invested with something special which sets them above 'ordinary people', in the public image if not in the reality of the personal lives they lead behind their closed doors.

Scruton put it well when referring to nations generally, and not just monarchies:-

"In truth, every state depends on symbolic offices through which the shared national loyalty can be expressed and ratified. If offices are to retain this function, they must be endowed with a protective veil of charisma. The British people are conniving with the media establishment to tear that veil away, to show that the occupants of the highest offices in the land are – amazingly – human beings, and to suggest in the course of this that no mere human being has the right to such a position. More simply put, they are engaged in collective treason – treason, not to the monarchy, but to themselves as a sovereign people."

Some then would argue: alright, give the royals their palaces and their subsidies, but don't give them too much; trim the cost of the institution and make them live a little more modestly. So what would that achieve? For every thousand people who support royalty in its generality, there are probably a thousand different views as to precisely what

SIR: I draw your attention to part of a letter from Robert Key in The Spectator of the 1st November, which mostly concerned the Duchess of Atholl. The part read:-

"In the Jewish Chronicle, 10.5.03, Geoffrey Alderman wrote the following: '(At) that time I was actively researching Jewish involvement in the National Front, and I enjoyed the dubious but fascinating privilege of interviewing Jewish members of that party. Although none of them seems to have realised it, by joining the party they were acting within a very long-established Jewish political tradition, namely that the safest way for diaspora Jewry to survive was to back every horse in the political race.'" (letter-writer's emphasis).

Therein lie our problems.

With regard to Peter Hitchens and Melanie Phillips, I think the correct term for them both is: 'Liberal Conservatives'. As they both write for newspapers, one must be careful of their real motives. They dare not write the full truth, for that would jeopardise their jobs!

The problem with the party system is that it keeps the country divided. Newspapers are employed just to do that. And I never forget what Disraeli said in his novel Coningsby: "... the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes." He would have known.

SIR: The European Constitution is to formalise, in terms explicit and binding, what has been fact for the leading politicians for over 50 years.

Our rulers can declare with sincerity that this evil Constitution does not change or affect our own Constitution in any way but simply clarifies existing circumstances.

They can say this in good faith because they gave away our sovereignty 55 years ago when they signed the so-called 'Treaty of Accession' to the United Nations Organisation.

The Charter of that institution implies that it must be invested with sovereignty in order for it to function at all, though it does not say so specifically. The devil is in the Accession Treaty. The word is not used, but it requires all national laws to yield to the diktats of UNO. The cunning and arrogant 'insiders' have proceeded along those lines ever since, and all the devastation of our country has resulted from the endless obsession with 'change' that is the political mantra of our destroyers.

The EU is merely one of the regional groups that the Charter mentions. Obviously, such things are easier to justify in a world where free competition means creating monopolies.

The whole set-up is a lie, and it depends on liars and deceivers, and ruthless enforcement of the will of the conspirators. Behold, I have used the forbidden word that generates howls of derision from the jackals of politics!

SIR: The BBC must be delighted with its coup exposing 'racism' in its documentary 'The Secret Policeman'.

There is smug delight from the commissars of political correctness as they force toadying politicians and senior policemen to grovel abjectly and outdo each other in their words of condemnation. I thought the best effort was that of Clive Wolfendale, Acting Deputy Chief Constable of North Wales, who said he actually felt 'physically sick' at what the programme revealed.

But what the BBC and its allies in the liberal establishment do not realise is that intelligent people are increasingly seeing through the lies and deceit. The very same week, the Crimewatch programme showed a reconstruction where a member of the ethnic minorities stabbed a white man to death in Holloway, North London. Obviously, the makers of the programme could not find a motive – though, had the races of the culprit and victim been reversed, I am sure they would have discovered a racial one!

This duplicity and hypocrisy do not go unnoticed. One day these liars will be called to account!

SIR: The dismissed cadets of the Greater Manchester Police have been universally condemned by the 'anti-racist' bigots of the controlled media and the top brass of the police, chary of their over-generous pensions, but not a lone voice has been allowed to cry in the wilderness in defence of the men.

Those who pay lip-service to the multi-racial society to safeguard their vested interests know as well as the rest of us that that society has been imposed upon the British people by the stealth and deceit of the liberal élite, and that it is hugely unpopular throughout the country.

When any attempt at discourse attracts the parrot cry of 'racist' it is wholly understandable that suppressed frustration will eventually burst out. And just what is it that the liberal élite are afraid of? Could it be that they know the multi-racial society to be so unstable that one escaping word of truth would be enough to detonate it?

The vilified cadets were perhaps a shade too outspoken, and careless with their language; but we ought to be relieved that there are still some among us who have not been cowed by the long years of bombardment with political correctness and anti-white propaganda, and still have the courage to say out loud what oft is thought but ne'er so firmly expressed.

SIR: Is there a qualified person (with pro-nationalist tendencies) who could fill a couple of pages of A4 with easily-understood English grammar and an explanation of symbols, such as inverted commas, apostrophes, split infinitives, and mixed metaphors? All would be a big help in raising standards among writers and make it more acceptable to read articles by racially aware people – instead of these being held up as the daubings of ill-educated despicable bigots.

Although I left school at 14 (in World War II) with no qualifications, I find I am an object of interest on account of my good English, and I have been asked to proof-read for publishers.

SIR: It seems to have escaped many people's notice that the Government, among its manifold immigration delinquencies, has effectively repealed for people under thirty all the restrictions on Commonwealth immigration introduced since 1962.

The long-standing working holidays scheme for youngsters from the Commonwealth was deemed to attract too many Whites, so it has been made much more attractive to non-Whites. This has been done by allowing the two-year visa – which has always applied to the scheme – to be enlarged (after, I believe, 12 months in the country) into a five-year work permit with – and this is the nice bit – a right to apply for permanent residence after four years. Such applications are seldom refused.

SIR: Doris Lessing on BBC's Radio Four on the 3rd November said she was totally in favour of 'free speech'. Time after time, liberals say this but never do they identify Spearhead as the last bastion of free speech.

It is not that none of them has ever heard of Spearhead. Former Archbishop of Canterbury Michael Ramsey once wanted to start a new magazine of this name but one of his colleagues told them that there was already a magazine called Spearhead. Many of these so-called 'liberal' free-speech believers know about Spearhead but refuse ever to speak about it nor even acknowledge its existence.

Back to the 15th century?

8,800 Spaniards were burnt to death for their beliefs – or maybe lack of beliefs – during Thomas de Torquemada's eighteen-year reign of terror as Grand Inquisitor. We mention this because, though on a somewhat more modest scale, it may all be happening again. If and when trumped up charges of 'racism' are brought against you, it is likely that you will put the matter into the hands of a local law firm, who will find themselves facing a 'special prosecutor' chosen by the CPS to deal with heretics like you. Since, thanks to the wiles of this polished performer, you are almost certain to be found guilty and condemned, you might just as well save some money by standing up in court and giving your tormentors as good as you get. So, take the stage, play the underdog, and have your moment of glory. As former US President Andrew Jackson once put it, "One man with courage makes a majority."

Lighten our darkness

An Austrian prophet, who claims to have made several accurate predictions, has recently published Vision 2004 Die nächsten 10 Jahre. According to this masterpiece, the next 10 years will be rather eventful. Following a worldwide political and economic crisis, we will witness the end of the EU and of multicultural societies. The downside will be the earth colliding with an asteroid and a third world war breaking out. However, survivors can look forward to a 'Golden Age' and the development of a new civilization! Looks to us like just another mixture of the good and the bad.

On the other hand, these developments could drive a coach and horses through the Pentagon's five-year counter-terrorism plan. According to former NATO Commander General Wesley Clark, the current hit list includes Syria, Lebanon, Libya, Iran, Somalia and Sudan. He quotes a high-ranking member of the US Administration as saying: "No one is going to tell us where we can and cannot bomb."

THE WAY WE LIVE NOW

Some observations on contemporary society
by JUNIUS

will be cheered by the arrival of a new blockbuster from Charles (Bell Curve) Murray. His Human Accomplishment: The Pursuit of Excellence in the Arts and Sciences, 800 BC to 1950 is set to cause extreme anguish in PC/Liberal circles. In it we are enjoined to lavish most of our scholarly energies on Dead White Males because they have been responsible for 97 per cent of human progress. "The West," says Murray, "has produced 834 significant literary figures," which is ten times as many as the nearest rival. And, in the arts and sciences, around three-quarters of "significant figures" originated in an area now comprising the countries of Britain, France, Germany and Italy.

We would take issue with him on certain points. He appears to have sadly neglected the contribution which ladies have made to the progress of our civilisation. Also, our fondness for Handel's organ concerti puts us in dispute with his rankings of a dead heat between Beethoven and Mozart, with Bach picking up the bronze. But this merely emphasises the wonder of a culture where we are confronted with an array of genius from which we can select our personal favourites.

A worldly education

How do you run a school in which the pupils speak more than a dozen different languages and have vastly different needs, abilities and academic prospects? Is it possible that our ever-innovative New Labour rulers have found an answer? We are advised that non-EU nationals now fill 15 per cent of the teaching places in our schools. And, if all foreign teachers are taken into account, almost 100 nations are represented in our British school staff rooms. Meanwhile, we read that more and more taxpayers' millions are being hurled at illegal schemes designed to improve the performance of children from ethnic minorities.

When will we see an end to this blatant racial discrimination?

Elsewhere, sterling efforts are being made to bring some sort of order to the chaotic state of the education scene. Charles Clarke – he's the one in charge – has announced that head teachers who allow their schools to run up massive deficits will be sent on remedial courses run by a City accountancy firm. This reminds us of the old banking tale of the lady who opened an account with a modest legacy and, on being warned by friends that she was overspending, cheerfully retorted that she had plenty of cheques left!

Defence of what realm?

As Tony Blair has discovered, kow-towing to our EU 'partners', and pleasing the United States at the same time, can be a circus trick too many. The German Government would like to see the armed forces of all EU member states under the control of the European Parliament. From their viewpoint, this may make some sense. NATO has long been an anachronism which serves no useful purpose, other than that it allows the US to keep a meddlesome finger in the pie. However, to put our own lads in a position where they would have to accept marching orders from Brussels would be just as suicidal as joining the single currency. And can you really imagine the Poles and Czechs, not to mention the Spanish, coming to our aid if the Argentines had another crack at the Falklands?

Here at home we should, theoretically, be safe as houses. The MoD's budget is running at £31 billion a year and they are still overspending! Unfortunately for us, very little of these funds is earmarked for the defence of these islands. Defence Secretary Hoon wants to improve Britain's ability to fight expeditionary wars with new lighter armed highly mobile vehicles, unmanned spy-in-the-sky reconnaissance systems, and other intelligence-gathering assets. Yet, at the same time, he announces lower pay for the Territorials. Welcome to the madhouse!

IDS RIP

We were saddened by the abrupt departure from the Tory leadership of Mr. Ian Duncan Smith, whose efforts to resuscitate the fortunes of his dying party were always good for a laugh when this column was short of material. Keeping his die-hard backwoodsmen happy, and at the same time guiding his ramshackle gang of opportunists towards the 'centre' was never a viable option.

It is noted that, following the age-old Tory ceremonial of scraping the bottom of the barrel, Mr. Michael Howard – offspring of Romanian asylum-seeker Bernat Hecht – has been selected, to popular acclaim, as his replacement. On past form, there is no reason to suppose that, if voted into power, this man would do a damned thing for Britain or the British people. Even so, he seems to think that his party could win the next-but-one general election, when – as surely as night follows day – it will be the Conservatives' turn to carry on with the business of wrecking the nation. And, guess what? All the fat cats who keep the Tories in funds are coming back into the fold. "Cheque books out, lads!" says 'Lord' Ashcroft (of Belize?), who is himself coughing up £2 million. Faced with such a challenge, 'Lord' Levy, Tony's tennis partner and fund-raiser-in-chief, will need to look to his laurels. What a wonderful thing our democracy is, and what a wonderful day it will be when we kiss this lot goodbye!

A balancing act for Blunkett

In 12 months time the Disability Discrimination Act will apply to all police forces. Jan Berry, Chairman of the Police Federation, suggests that the Home Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers have yet to grasp the nettle. "There have been lots of people talking about how it might affect people, but nobody is really coming up with any real decisions," observes this lady. Always anxious to help, may we suggest that the Act should also apply to organised crime, which would, we think, even things up!

North West London launches GLA/Mayoral campaign

North West London BNP launched its GLA/Mayoral campaign at an excellent meeting on the 26th October, with Mayoral candidate Julian Leppert speaking to an audience of some 50 people.

The meeting was chaired by NW London organiser Ian Edward, who also told the audience how local activists had been successful in fighting a campaign which culminated in a coachload of demonstrators turning up at Uxbridge Civic Centre.

Ian then introduced Gareth Jones of the Hounslow & Feltham unit, who in his very competent maiden speech gave an insight into the campaign now being conducted by FAIR (Families Against Immigrant Racism). Working organiser Frank McAllister then gave a run-down on activities and elections in which his group have been involved.

The London mayoral candidate, Julian Leppert, gave an entertaining speech which had the audience in laughter with his opinions on the disgraceful way the city is being run.

After a break for an excellent cold buffet, accompanied by patriotic music, there was a fine speech, as always, from veteran campaigner Richard Edmonds, ending in a spontaneous standing ovation by an enthused audience.

The Eleventh Hour

The Eleventh Hour has been described as the 'Bible' of the British National Party. First published in 1988, the latest (1998) edition has been updated to take in the many new developments on the political scene occurring since. Written by the founder of the British National Party, John Tyndall, the book gives comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain. It delves into the ideologies of liberalism, conservatism and the left, and also examines that of British Nationalism and its background. It contains extensive analyses of the British economy and political system. It looks at issues connected with freedom and order, the mass media, the environment, race and immigration, Northern Ireland, the Commonwealth, foreign policy and defence. It also gives a detailed outline of the development of the BNP and its predecessor organisations in Britain.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages. It is partly autobiographical, giving an account of the author's origins, early political awakening and subsequent life's work.

Case against Tyndall collapses

BNP founder reinstated

The attempt to drum John Tyndall out of the British National Party by use of the party's disciplinary machinery collapsed in shambles last month as he was reinstated to membership following representations from his solicitor to party chairman Nick Griffin. Mr. Griffin was clearly persuaded by his own legal advisers that the case against Mr. Tyndall as originally brought had no chance of standing up in a court of law, and therefore that his sole option was to rescind the expulsion of him, decided by a four-man disciplinary 'tribunal' on the 3rd August, and agree to his reinstatement as a member of the BNP.

In our September issue we reported on the somewhat farcical proceedings of the tribunal, and so there is no need to repeat everything here. As explained in that report, seven charges were originally served against Mr. Tyndall, but four of these were dropped during the tribunal sitting. On a fifth charge the tribunal acquitted Mr. Tyndall, but it found him guilty on the two remaining charges, namely that he had personally 'slandered' Nick Griffin and that he had collectively 'slandered' the BNP leadership.

Immediately upon notice of the expulsion, Mr. Tyndall placed the matter in the hands of a London solicitor, stating that he sought to make an application for judicial review of the case – which would mean taking it to a court of law unless in the meantime an out-of-court settlement resulting in the quashing of his expulsion and his consequent reinstatement could be negotiated.

Mr. Tyndall's case was that the conduct of the proceedings against him completely violated principles of natural justice. The essence of his arguments in these regards was given in our September report. In addition, he claimed that the specific charges upon which he was found 'guilty' and expelled had no terms of reference within the Constitution of the party and that therefore the 'guilty' verdict on these was invalid at first base – quite irrespective of any other merits or demerits involved in the case.

Out-of-court settlement sought

It was Mr. Tyndall's desire from the beginning of this case to have it settled out of court because, had it gone to court and – as is almost certain – Mr. Griffin lost, very high costs would have been incurred by the defendant. Had these costs been awarded against Mr. Griffin personally and had it been likely that they could have been extracted from him, this would not have mattered. However, Mr. Griffin and Mr. Tony Lecomber, his accomplice in the action, would undoubtedly have expected the party – in other words its subscription-paying members – to have rescued them from the consequences of their own malice and folly and footed the legal bill. This would have been financially crippling to the BNP. Hence the attempt at the out-of-court settlement, which was eventually achieved. Some costs have indeed been incurred, but they are immeasurably less than those that would have been run up in a court action.

Charges against him floundered – not once but twice.

A further try

The attempt to expel Mr. Tyndall on these original charges having failed, Messrs. Griffin and Lecomber then immediately tried to 'get' him on some new charges. These related to items published in the October and November issues of Spearhead. Mr. Griffin wrote to Mr. Tyndall's solicitor on the 5th November acknowledging defeat on the original charges and informing him of Mr. Tyndall's consequent reinstatement. At the same time he informed him that the new charges had been introduced and that Mr. Tyndall would be receiving notification of them shortly. This happened in a letter from Mr. Lecomber bearing the same date. Pending a hearing on the new charges, Mr. Tyndall was suspended from the membership to which he had just been reinstated!

As with the original charges, these new charges also fell at the first hurdle. The writing and publication of the items to which Messrs. Griffin and Lecomber objected occurred at a time after Mr. Tyndall had been expelled from the party and before his subsequent reinstatement. During that period of approximately three months, he was deprived of his rights of membership and therefore was removed from any subjection to the disciplinary rules of membership. This was pointed out to Mr. Griffin and Mr. Lecomber. Again, they evidently took legal counsel (which they would have been far better advised to have done before bringing the new charges) and immediately dropped the charges and the suspension.

Thus did Messrs. Griffin and Lecomber add further to an unnecessary bill for legal costs which they will expect the party to pay.

These costs are likely to become a matter for dispute. The letter to Mr. Griffin from Mr. Tyndall's solicitor offering him the chance of an out-of-court settlement was sent on the 8th October. After three weeks had elapsed, no reply to this letter had been received either by the solicitor or by Mr. Tyndall himself. There is a condition of applications for judicial review of cases like these that they must be made within three months of the date of the expulsions to which they relate. To ensure that Mr. Tyndall's application fell within this time limit, and to allow for any possible last-minute procedural hitches, it was decided that it must be taken to court on the 31st October, a Friday. Court and solicitor's fees totalling £210.00 were incurred in this process.

Mr. Griffin subsequently wrote to Mr. Tyndall's solicitor on the 5th November saying that he had received court notification of the application and that this had crossed in the post with his letter rescinding the expulsion. Consequently, according to his theory, the application had been unnecessary and he had asked for it to be struck out as 'irrelevant'.

In other words, Mr. Griffin, having failed over three weeks to reply to the proposal of an out-of-court settlement, does so at the very last moment – after the application has been put in to the court – and expects to be absolved from any costs incurred!

To date, the total costs incurred in the action amount to £3,241.50.

With regard to the legal fund set up to cover these costs, at the time of our going to press £2,579.05 has been raised. For the moment, we are asking for no further donations to this fund. As soon as costs in the action have been fully recovered – and we do not know how long this will take – we will be in touch with donors concerning the disposal of the money raised and unused. In the meantime, our deepest thanks are due to all who have contributed. Their support and generosity is enormously appreciated.

Talk of 'technicalities'

Doubtless, Messrs. Griffin and Lecomber will be communicating their own version of these events to the members of the party, and we anticipate that their excuse for the fiasco will be that Mr. Tyndall got off the charges on 'technicalities' – a word already used in correspondence received from them. Mr. Tyndall is confident that had these 'technicalities' not resulted in the charges failing even to get beyond the starting block, as happened, he could nevertheless have defended himself successfully against them in a court of law on the grounds that they did not properly fall within the limits of permissible constitutional rules in a democratic organisation, which must provide for the right of members to engage in internal controversy without being gagged.

We have heard that Mr. Lecomber is now going about telling people in the party that he and Mr. Griffin are going to hound Mr. Tyndall out of the BNP one way or the other, bringing further disciplinary charges against him until eventually one sticks.

We shall see.

REPUBLICANISM: TIME TO BURY IT, NOT TO PRAISE IT

degree of pomp and panoply should surround it: how many palaces and royal houses, how many cars, how many staff. Is it really worth a huge national debate? Are there not more important issues that we should be exercised over? Aren't we getting immersed in trivia when the vastly bigger picture of national affairs is what should be demanding our concern and passion? The economics involved in these arguments are small beer compared with far more urgent national issues.

And one further observation could be made. Is it not strange that those who shout loudest in protest against royal wealth are strangely mute when it comes to the ridiculous affluence, luxury and ostentation which surround so many of today's popular entertainers – mostly quite worthless people and many of whom set quite revolting examples to the young in their degenerate lifestyles? Just where is the 'universal ache of envy' and the leftish instinct to 'drag down' when these people's quite obscene wealth is put on display?

Our national heritage

But there is much more to royalty than this. By a combination of accidents of history, Britain is the one remaining major nation in which the institution of royalty has survived. For better or for worse, this institution is a central part of our identity and tradition, our heritage. It is a very large element in what defines us as a nation – along with our flag, our anthem, our language, our culture and our history. Royalty is a symbol of Britain.

There is an argument for getting rid of long-established national symbols when they have a genuinely crippling effect on national efficiency and strength. No such argument exists in the case of the United Kingdom nor its offshoots in the Commonwealth of Nations where people of our stock reside. The removal of the Crown from the constitutions of Britain or her former Dominions would not contribute in the slightest to any solution of the real problems of these countries nor add in the slightest to their welfare. On the other hand, it would take away from them something that is so much a part of their history that they would feel spiritually and culturally impoverished without it.

And mention of those countries which not long ago we were pleased and proud to call the 'Dominions' – and which they were equally pleased and proud to be thus called – brings us to another factor. Leaving aside tradition, sentiment and so much else evoked by those words, it is a matter of real practical necessity for the future that Britain rebuild the once-strong connections which bonded those countries together with herself in mutually beneficial association. If there is to be an alternative to the European Union which grants us again our lost sovereignty while giving us the means to survive in a world of large powers, it must lie in a renewal of that association, in which the most important bond – above the Royal Family, trade and co-operation in foreign affairs and defence – is that of race, the commonality of blood between people of British descent.

Of all the traditions, institutions and symbols once linking these peoples together, the British Monarchy is the sole surviving one of consequence and importance. That is why I believe that it is no accident that the Monarchy is currently so heavily under attack in all the countries concerned, particularly Australia. Our common enemies have something much more important on their agenda than the removal of crowns, royal standards and heads on postage stamps. They want to break up the British family of peoples, so that each section of that family is separately without the power to survive as a meaningful entity in the world of the future, and thus to resist incorporation in the global New World Order.

For this reason among others of crucial national importance, we must not allow ourselves to be obsessed with sensationalist stories, authentic or not, leaking out from the royal household, nor with the obvious personal inadequacies of the of the present Heir to the Throne. We need, as in so much else, to focus on the bigger picture, and perceive where our political seducers and would-be betrayers are trying to lead us.

Scruton in The Spectator seemed to see things the same way. Speaking of the levelling influence of The Guardian in its anti-monarchist diatribes, he said:-

"How should we confront this state of mind? Were it to become the norm, our nation would be inexorably set on the path to extinction. And, of course, there are those who would welcome that result, who see our national sovereignty and the culture that sustains it as offences against the new international order and obstacles of the emerging super-state of Europe."

We need, in other words, to bury the republican issue once and for all, and open our eyes to the real forces destroying Britain – so that we may bring all our resources to the task of defeating them.

A VIDEO WORTH HAVING!

A new video has just been brought out by the Friends of Spearhead which is strongly recommended to readers. It is a recording of a report on the British National Party, broadcast in 1994 on the Sixty Minutes programme in the United States, a regular current affairs feature. The video is of 13 minutes' duration and includes an interview with the then BNP leader John Tyndall, some shots of a speech by Mr. Tyndall at a party rally, a scene from a march through East London and discussions with BNP supporters at a pub nearby.

The programme followed the party's election victory on the Isle of Dogs in September 1993 and was focused on the growing support this victory indicated.

There is one thing we must mention that is vitally important. We are distributing this video solely for its interest value, and not for profit. The charge we are making is just enough to cover the cost of making copies and of postage and packaging. Under no circumstances should copies be made and sold for profit by any other persons, as this would infringe copyright rules.

For a copy send £2.00 to Friends of Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence another need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be appreciated. Thanks.
